CHAPTER I

GOING AWAY

SHALL never forget the one-fourth serious and three-fourths comical astonishment with which, on the morning of the third of January, eighteen hundred and forty-two, I opened the door of, and put my head into, a "state-room" on board the Britannia steam-packet, twelve hundred tons burden per register, bound for Halifax and Boston, and carrying Her Majesty's mails

That this state-room had been specially engaged for "Charles Dickens, Esquire, and Lady," was rendered sufficiently clear, even to my scared intellect, by a very small manuscript announcing the fact, which was pinned on a very flat quilt, covering a very thin mattress, spread like a surgical plaster on a most maccessible shelf But that this was the state-room concerning which Charles Dickens, Esquire, and Lady had held daily and nightly conferences for at least four months preceding, that this could by any possibility be that small snug chamber of the imagination which Charles Dickens. Esquire, with the spirit of prophecy strong upon him. had always foretold would contain at least one little sofa, and which his lady, with a modest yet most magnificent sense of its limited dimensions, had from the first opined would not hold more than two enormous portmanteaus in some odd corner out of sight (portmanteaus which could now no more be got in at the door, not to say stowed away, than a giraffe could be persuaded or forced into a flower-pot), that this utterly impracticable, thoroughly hopeless; and profoundly preposterous box had the remotest reference to, or connec tion with those chaste and pretty, not to say gorgeous, little bowers, sketched by a masterly hand, in the highly-varnished lithographic plan hanging up in the agent's counting house in the city of London, that this room of state, in short, could be anything but a pleasant fiction and cheerful jest of the captain's, invented and put in practice for the better relish and enjoyment of the real state room presently to be disclosed,—these were truths which I really could not, for the moment, bring my mind at all to bear upon or comprehend And I sat down upon a kind of horsehair slab or perch, of which there were two within, and looked, without any expression of countenance whatever, at some friends who had come on board with us, and who were crushing their faces into all manner of shapes by endeavouring to squeeze them through the small doorway

We had experienced a pretty smart shock before coming below, which, but that we were the most sanguine people living, might have prepared us for the worst The imaginative artist, to whom I have already made allusion, has depicted in the same great work a chamber of almost interminable perspective, furnished, as Mr Robins would say, in a style of more than Eastern splendour, and filled (but not inconven iently so) with groups of ladies and gentlemen in the very highest state of enjoyment and vivacity Before descending into the bowels of the ship, we had passed from the deck into a long narrow apartment, not unlike a gigantic hearse with windows in the sides, having at the upper end a melancholy stove, at which three or four chilly stewards were warming their hands, while on either side, extending down its whole dreary length, was a long, long table, over each of which a rack, fixed to the low roof, and stuck full of drinking-glasses and cruet-stands, hinted dismally at rolling seas and heavy weather I had not at that time seen the ideal presentment of this chamber which has since gratified me so much, but I observed that one of our friends who had made the arrange ments for our voyage turned pale on entering, retreated on the friend behind him, smote his forehead involuntarily, and said below his breath, "Impossible! it cannot be!" or words to that effect. He recovered himself, however, by a great effort, and after a preparatory cough or two, cried, with a ghastly smile which is still before me, looking at the same time round the walls, "Ha! the breakfast-room, steward—eh?" We all foresaw what the answer must be, we knew the agony he suffered. He had often spoken of the saloon, had taken in and lived upon the pictorial idea, had usually given us to understand at home that, to form a just conception of it, it would be necessary to multiply the size and furniture of an ordinary drawing-room by seven, and then fall short of the reality. When the man in reply avowed the truth—the blunt, remorseless, naked truth, "This is the saloon, sir "-he actually reeled beneath the blow

In persons who were so soon to part, and interpose between their else daily communication the formidable barrier of many thousand miles of stormy space, and who were for that reason anxious to cast no other cloud, not even the passing shadow of a moment's disappointment or discomfiture, upon the short interval of happy companionship that yet remained to them —in persons so situated, the natural transition from these first surprises was obviously into peals of hearty laughter, and I can report that I, for one, being still seated upon the slab or perch before mentioned, roared outright until the vessel rang again Thus, in less than two minutes after coming upon it for the first time, we all by common consent agreed that this state room was the pleasantest and most facetious and capital contrivance possible, and that to have had it one inch larger would have been quite a disagreeable and deplorable state of things And with this, and with showing howby very nearly closing the door, and twining in and out like serpents, and by counting the little washing slab as standing room—we could manage to insinuate four people into it, all at one time, and entreating each other to observe how very arry it was (in dock), and how there was a beautiful porthole which could be kept open all day (weather permitting), and how there was quite a large bull's-eye just over the lookingglass which would render shaving a perfectly easy and delightful process (when the ship didn't roll too much), we arrived at last at the unanimous conclusion that it was rather spacious than otherwise, though I do verily believe that, deducting the two berths, one above the other, than which nothing smaller for sleeping in was ever made, except coffins, it was no bigger than one of those hackney cabriolets which have the door behind, and shoot their fares out like sacks of coals upon the pavement

Having settled this point to the perfect satisfaction of all parties, concerned and unconcerned, we sat down round the fire in the ladies' cabin—just to try the effect. It was rather dark, certainly, but somebody said, "Of course it would be light at sea"—a proposition to which we all assented, echoing, "Of course, of course," though it would be exceedingly difficult to say why we thought so. I remember, too, when we had discovered and exhausted another topic of consolation in the circumstance of this ladies' cabin adjoining our stateroom, and the consequently immense feasibility of sitting there at all times and seasons, and had fallen into a momentary silence, learning our faces on our hands and looking at the fire, one of our party said, with the solemn air of a man who had made a discovery, "What a relish mulled claret will have down here!" which appeared to strike us all most forcibly, as though there were something spicy and high-flavoured in cabins which essentially improved that composition, and rendered it quite incapable of perfection anywhere else

There was a stewardess, too, actively engaged in producing clean sheets and tablecloths from the very entrails of the sofas, and from unexpected lockers of such artful mechanism that it made one's head ache to see them opened one after another, and rendered it quite a distracting circumstance to follow her proceedings, and to find that every nook and corner and individual piece of furniture was something else besides what it pretended to be, and was a mere trap and deception, and place of secret stowage, whose ostensible purpose was its least useful one

God bless that stewardess for her piously fraudulent accourt of January voyages! God bless her for her clear recollection of the companion passage of last year, when pobody was ill, and everybody danced from morning to night, and it was "a run" of twelve days, and a piece of the purest frolic, and delight, and jollity! All happiness be with her for her bright face and her pleasant Scotch tongue, which had sounds of old Home in it for my fellow-traveller, and for her predictions of fair winds and fine weather (all wrong, or I shouldn't be half so fond of her), and for the ten thousand small fragments of genuine womanly tact by which, without piecing them elaborately together, and patching them up into shape and form and case and pointed application, she nevertheless did plainly show that all young mothers on one side of the Atlantic were near and close at hand to their little children left upon the other, and that what seemed to the uninitiated a serious journey, was to those who were in the secret a mere frolic, to be sung about and whistled at Light be her heart, and gay her merry eyes for years!

The state-room had grown pretty fast, but by this time it had expanded into something quite bulky, and almost boasted a bay-window to view the sea from So we went upon deck again in high spirits, and there everything was in such a state of bustle and active preparation that the blood quickened its pace, and whirled through one's veins on that clear frosty morning with involuntary mirthfulness For every gallant ship was riding slowly up and down, and every little boat was splashing noisily in the water, and knots of people stood upon the wharf, gazing with a kind of "dread delight" on the far-famed fast American steamer, and one party of men were "taking in the milk," or, in other words, getting the cow on board, and another were filling the icehouses to the very throat with fresh provisions—with butcher's-meat and gardenstuff, pale sucking-pigs, calves' heads in scores, beef, veal, and pork, and poultry out of all proportion, and others were coiling ropes and busy with oakum yarns, and others were lowering heavy packages into the hold, and the purser's head was barely visible as it loomed in a state of exquisite perplexity from the midst of a vast pile of passengers' luggage, and there seemed to be nothing going on anywhere, or uppermost in the mind of anybody, but preparations for this mighty voyage This, with the bright cold sun, the bracing air, the crisply-curling water, the thin white crust of morning ice upon the decks, which crackled with a sharp and cheerful sound beneath the lightest tread, was irresistible. And when, again upon the shore, we turned and saw from the vessel's mast her name signalled in flags of joyous colours, and fluttering by their side the beautiful American banner with its stars and stripes—the long three thousand miles and more, and, longer still, the six whole months of absence, so dwindled and faded, that the ship had gone out and come home again, and it was broad spring already in the Coburg Dock at Liverpool

I have not inquired among my medical acquaintance whether turtle and cold punch, with hock, champagne, and claret, and all the slight et cetera usually included in an unlimited order for a good dinner-especially when it is left to the liberal construction of my faultless friend, Mr Radley of the Adelphi Hotel-are peculiarly calculated to suffer a sea change, or whether a plain mutton-chop, and a glass or two of sherry, would be less likely of conversion into foreign and disconcerting material My own opinion is, that whether one is discreet or indiscreet in these particulars on the eve of a sea-voyage is a matter of little consequence, and that, to use a common phrase, "it comes to very much the same thing in the end" Be this as it may, I know that the dinner of that day was undeniably perfect—that it comprehended all these items, and a great many more—and that we all did ample justice to it And I know too, that, bating a certain tacit avoidance of any allusion to to morrow-such as may be supposed to prevail between delicate-minded turnkeys and a sensitive prisoner who is to be hanged next morning we got on very well, and, all things considered, were merry enough

When the morning—the morning—came, and we met at breakfast, it was curious to see how eager we all were to prevent a moment's pause in the conversation, and how astoundingly gay everybody was the forced spirits of each member of the little party having as much likeness to his natural mirth, as hot house peas at five guineas the quart resemble in flavour the growth of the dews, and air, and rain of heaven. But as one o'clock, the hour for going aboard, drew near, this volubility dwindled away by little and little, despite the most persevering efforts to the contrary, until at last, the matter being now quite desperate, we threw off all disguise, openly speculated upon where we should be this time to-morrow, this time next day, and so forth, and entrusted a vast number of messages to those who intended returning to town that night, which were to be delivered at home and elsewhere without fail, within the very shortest possible space of time after the arrival of the railway train at Euston Square And commissions and remembrances do so crowd upon one at such a time, that we were still busied with this employment when we found ourselves fused, as it were, into a dense conglomeration of passengers and passengers' friends and passengers' luggage, all jumbled together on the deck of a small steamboat, and panting and snorting off to the packet, which had worked out of dock yesterday afternoon, and was now lying at her moorings in the river

And there she is! All eyes are turned to where she lies, dimly discernible through the gathering fog of the early winter afternoon, every finger is pointed in the same direction, and murmurs of interest and admiration—as "How beautiful she looks!" "How trim she is!"—are heard on every side Even the lazy gentleman with his hat on one side and his hands in his pockets, who has dispensed so much consolation by inquiring with a yawn of another gentleman whether he is "going across"—as if it were a ferry even he condescends to look that way, and nod his head, as who should say, "No mistake about that " and not even the sage Lord Burleigh in his nod included half so much as this lazy gentleman of might who has made the passage (as everybody on board has found out already, it's impossible to say how) thirteen times without a single accident! There is another passenger very much wrapped-up, who has been frowned down by the rest, and morally trampled upon and crushed, for presuming to inquire with a timid interest how long it is since the poor President went down He is standing close to the lazy gentleman, and says with a faint smile that he believes She is a very strong Ship, to which the lazy gentleman, looking first in his questioner's eye and then very hard in the wind's, answers unexpectedly and ominously that She need be Upon this the lazy gentleman instantly falls very low in the popular estimation, and the passengers, with looks of defiance, whisper to each other that he is an ass, and an impostor, and clearly don't know anything at all about it

But we are made fast alongside the packet, whose huge red funnel is smoking bravely, giving rich promise of serious Packing cases, portmanteaus, carpet bags, and boxes are already passed from hand to hand, and hauled on board with breathless rapidity The officers, smartly dressed, are at the gangway handing the passengers up the side, and hurrying the men In five minutes' time, the little steamer is utterly deserted, and the packet is beset and overrun by its late freight, who instantly pervade the whole ship, and are to be met with by the dozen in every nook and corner swarming down below with their own baggage, and stumbling over other people's, disposing themselves comfortably in wrong cabins, and creating a most horrible confusion by having to turn out again, madly bent upon opening locked doors, and on forcing a passage into all kinds of out-of-the-way places where there is no thoroughfare, sending wild stewards, with elfin hair, to and fro upon the breezy decks on unintelligible errands, impossible of execution—and in short, creating the most extraordinary and bewildering tumult In the midst of all this, the lazy gentleman, who seems to have no luggage of any kind-not so much as a friend, even-lounges up and down the hurricane deck, coolly puffing a cigar, and, as this unconcerned demeanour again exalts him in the opinion of those who have lessure to observe his proceedings, every time he looks up at the masts, or down at the decks, or over the side, they look there too, as wondering whether he sees anything wrong anywhere, and hoping that, in case he should, he will have the goodness to mention it

What have we here? The captain's boat! and yonder the captain himself Now, by all our hopes and wishes, the very man he ought to be! A well-made, tight-built, dapper little fellow, with a ruddy face, which is a letter of invitation to shake him by both hands at once, and with a clear, blue honest eye, that it does one good to see one's sparkling image in. "Ring the bell!" "Ding, ding, ding!" the very bell is in a hurry "Now for the shore—who's for the shore?"—"These gentlemen, I am sorry to say" They are away, and never said good-bye Ah! now they wave it from the little boat "Good-bye! good-bye!" Three cheers from them, three more from us, three more from them and they are gone

To and fro, to and fro, to and fro again a hundred times! This waiting for the latest mail-bags is worse than all If we could have gone off in the midst of that last burst, we should have started triumphantly, but to he here, two hours and more, in the damp fog, neither staying at home nor going abroad, is letting one gradually down into the very depths of dullness and low spirits A speck in the mist, at last! That's something It is the boat we wait for! That's more to the The captain appears on the paddle-box with his purpose speaking trumpet, the officers take their stations, all hands are on the alert, the flagging hopes of the passengers revive, the cooks pause in their savoury work, and look out with faces full of interest. The boat comes alongside, the bags are dragged in anyhow, and flung down for the moment any-Three cheers more and as the first one rings upon our ears, the vessel throbs like a strong giant that has just received the breath of life, the two great wheels turn fiercely round for the first time, and the noble ship, with wind and tide astern, breaks proudly through the lashed and foaming water

THE PASSAGE OUT

WE all dined together that day, and a rather formidable party we were—no fewer than eighty-six strong. The vessel being pretty deep in the water, with all her coals on board and so many passengers, and the weather being calm and quiet, there was but little motion, so that before the dinner was half over, even those passengers who were most distrustful of themselves plucked up amazingly, and those who in the morning had returned to the universal question, "Are you a good sailor?" a very decided negative, now either partied the inquiry with the evasive reply, "Oh! I suppose I'm no worse than anybody else," or, reckless of all moral obligations, answered boldly, "Yes" and with some irritation too, as though they would add, "I should like to know what you see in me, sir, particularly, to justify suspicion!"

Notwithstanding this high tone of courage and confidence, I could not but observe that very few remained long over their wine, and that everybody had an unusual love of the open air, and that the favourite and most coveted seats were invariably those nearest to the door The tea-table, too, was by no means as well attended as the dinner-table, and there was less whist-playing than might have been expected with the exception of one lady, who had retired with some precipitation at dinner-time, immediately after being assisted to the finest cut of a very yellow boiled leg of mutton with very green capers, there were no invalids as yet, and walking, and smoking, and drinking of brandy and water (but always in the open air), went on with unabated spirit, until eleven o'clock or thereabouts, when "turning in"-no sailor of seven hours' experience talks of going to bed-became the order of the night The perpetual tramp of boot-heels on the decks gave place to a heavy silence, and the whole human freight was stowed away below, excepting a very few stragglers, like myself, who were probably, like me, afraid to go there

To one unaccustomed to such scenes, this is a very striking time on shipboard Afterwards, and when its novelty had long worn off, it never ceased to have a peculiar interest and charm for me The gloom through which the great black mass holds its direct and certain course, the rushing water, plainly heard, but dimly seen, the broad, white, glistening track that follows in the vessel's wake, the men on the lookout forward, who would be scarcely visible against the dark sky but for their blotting out some score of glistening stars, the helmsman at the wheel, with the illuminated card before him, shining, a speck of light amidst the darkness, like something sentient and of Divine intelligence, the melancholy sighing of the wind through block, and rope, and chain, the gleaming forth of light from every crevice, nook, and tiny piece of glass about the decks, as though the ship were filled with fire in hiding, ready to burst through any outlet, wild with its resistless power of death and ruin At first, too, and even when the hour, and all the objects it exalts, have come to be familiar, it is difficult, alone and thoughtful, to hold them to their proper shapes and forms. They change with the wandering fancy, assume the semblance of things left far away, put on the well remembered aspect of favourite places dearly loved, and even people them with shadows Streets, houses, rooms, figures so like their usual occupants, that they have startled me by their reality, which far exceeded, as it seemed to me, all power of mine to conjure up the absent, have, many and many a time, at such an hour, grown suddenly out of objects with whose real look, and use, and purpose, I was as well acquainted as with my own two hands

My own two hands, and feet likewise, being very cold, however, on this particular occasion, I crept below at mid-It was not exactly comfortable below decidedly close, and it was impossible to be unconscious of the presence of that extraordinary compound of strange smells which is to be found nowhere but on board ship, and which is such a subtle perfume that it seems to enter at every pore of the skin and whisper of the hold Two passengers' wives (one of them my own) lay already in silent agonies on the sofa, and one lady's-maid (my lady's) was a mere bundle on the floor, execrating her destiny, and pounding her curlpapers among the stray boxes Everything sloped the wrong way—which in itself was an aggravation scarcely to be borne I had left the door open, a moment before, in the bosom of a gentle declivity, and, when I turned to shut it, it was on the summit of a lofty eminence Now every plank and timber creaked, as if the ship were made of wicker-work, and now crackled, like an enormous fire of the driest possible twigs There was nothing for it but bed, so I went to bed

It was pretty much the same for the next two days, with a tolerably fair wind and dry weather. I read in bed (but to this hour I don't know what) a good deal, and reeled on deck a little, drank cold brandy-and-water with an unspeakable disgust, and ate hard biscuit perseveringly not ill, but going to be

It is the third morning I am awakened out of my sleep

by a dismal shriek from my wife, who demands to know whether there's any danger I rouse myself, and look out of bed The water-jug is plunging and leaping like a lively dolphin, all the smaller articles are afloat, except my shoes, which are stranded on a carpet-bag, high and dry, like a couple of coal barges Suddenly I see them spring into the air, and behold the looking glass, which is nailed to the wall, sticking fast upon the ceiling. At the same time the door entirely disappears, and a new one is opened in the floor. Then I begin to comprehend that the state-room is standing on its head.

Before it is possible to make any arrangement at all compatible with this novel state of things, the ship rights Before one can say "Thank Heaven!" she wrongs again Before one can cry she is wrong, she seems to have started forward. and to be a creature actively running of its own accord, with broken knees and failing legs, through every variety of hole and pitfall, and stumbling constantly Before one can so much as wonder, she takes a high leap into the air Before she has well done that, she takes a deep dive into the water Before she has gained the surface, she throws a summerset The instant she is on her legs, she rushes backward And so she goes on staggering, heaving, wrestling, leaping, diving, jumping, pitching, throbbing, rolling, and rocking—and going through all these movements, sometimes by turns, and sometimes altogether-until one feels disposed to roar for mercy

A steward passes "Steward!"—"Sir?"—"What 25 the matter? what do you call this?"—"Rather a heavy sea on, sir, and a head-wind"

A head-wind! Imagine a human face upon the vessel's prow, with fifteen thousand Samsons in one bent upon driving her back, and hitting her exactly between the eyes whenever she attempts to advance an inch. Imagine the ship herself, with every pulse and artery of her huge body swollen and bursting under this maltreatment, sworn to go on or die. Imagine the wind howling, the sea roaring, the rain beating all in furious array against her. Picture the sky both dark and wild, and the clouds, in fearful sympathy with the waves, making another ocean in the air. Add to all this, the clattering on deck and down below, the tread of hurried feet, the loud hoarse shouts of seamen, the gurgling in and out of water through the scuppers, with, every now and then, the striking of a heavy sea upon the planks above with the deep, dead, heavy sound of thunder heard within a vault,—and there is the head-wind of that January morning

I say nothing of what may be called the domestic noises of the ship—such as the breaking of glass and crockery, the tumbling down of stewards, the gambols, overhead, of loose casks and truant dozens of bottled porter, and the very remarkable and far from exhilarating sounds raised in their various state-rooms by the seventy passengers who were too ill to get up to breakfast. I say nothing of them, for although I lay listening to this concert for three or four days, I don't think I heard it for more than a quarter of a minute, at the expiration of which term I lay down again, excessively sea-sick

Not sea-sick, be it understood, in the ordinary acceptation of the term—I wish I had been—but in a form which I have never seen or heard described, though I have no doubt it is very common I lay there, all the day long, quite coolly and contentedly, with no sense of weariness, with no desire to get up, or get better, or take the air, with no curiosity, or care, or regret, of any sort or degree, saving that I think I can remember, in this universal indifference, having a kind of lazy 10y-of fiendish delight, if anything so lethargic can be dignified with the title—in the fact of my wife being too ill to talk to me If I may be allowed to illustrate my state of mind by such an example, I should say that I was exactly in the condition of the elder Mr Willet, after the incursion of the rioters into his bar at Chigwell Nothing would have surprised me If, in the momentary illumination of any ray of intelligence that may have come upon me in the way of thoughts of Home, a goblin postman, with a scarlet coat and bell, had come into that little kennel before me, broad awake in broad day, and, apologizing for being damp through walking in the sea, had handed me a letter directed to myself, in familiar characters. I am certain I should not have felt one atom of astonishment I should have been perfectly satisfied If Neptune himself had walked in, with a toasted shark on his trident, I should have looked upon the event as one of the very commonest everyday occurrences

Once-once-I found myself on deck I don't know how I got there, or what possessed me to go there, but there I was, and completely dressed too, with a huge pea coat on, and a pair of boots such as no weak man in his senses could ever have got into I found myself standing, when a gleam of consciousness came upon me, holding on to something-I don't know what I think it was the boatswain, or it may have been the pump, or possibly the cow I can't say how long I had been there—whether a day or a minute recollect trying to think about something (about anything in the whole wide world, I was not particular) without the smallest effect I could not even make out which was the sea, and which the sky, for the horizon seemed drunk, and was flying wildly about in all directions Even in that incapable state, however, I recognized the lazy gentleman standing before me-nautically clad in a suit of shaggy blue, with an oilskin hat But I was too imbecile, although I knew it to be he, to separate him from his dress, and tried to call him, I remember, Pilot After another interval of total unconsciousness, I found he had gone, and recognized another figure in its place It seemed to wave and fluctuate before me as though I saw it reflected in an unsteady looking But I knew it for the captain, and such was the cheerful influence of his face, that I tried to smile yes, even then I tried to smile I saw by his gestures that he addressed me, but it was a long time before I could make out that he remonstrated against my standing up to my knees in wateras I was, of course I don't know why I tried to thank him. but couldn't I could only point to my boots-or wherever I supposed my boots to be—and say in a plaintive voice, "Cork soles" at the same time endeavouring, I am told, to sit down in the pool Finding that I was quite insensible, and for the time a maniac, he humanely conducted me below

There I remained until I got better suffering, whenever I was recommended to eat anything, an amount of anguish only second to that which is said to be endured by the apparently drowned, in the process of restoration to life

One gentleman on board had a letter of introduction to me from a mutual friend in London He sent it below with his card, on the morning of the head-wind, and I was long troubled with the idea that he might be up, and well, and a hundred times a day expecting me to call upon him in the saloon I imagined him one of those cast-iron images—I will not call them men—who ask, with red faces and lusty voices, what sea sickness means, and whether it really is as bad as it is represented to be This was very torturing indeed, and I don't think I ever felt such perfect gratification and gratitude of heart, as I did when I heard from the ship's doctor that he had been obliged to put a large mustard poultice on this very gentleman's stomach I date my recovery from the receipt of that intelligence

It was materially assisted though, I have no doubt, by a heavy gale of wind, which came slowly up at sunset, when we were about ten days out, and raged with gradually increasing fury until morning, saving that it lulled for an hour a little before midnight. There was something in the unnatural repose of that hour, and in the after gathering of the storm, so inconceivably awful and tremendous, that its bursting into full violence was almost a relief

The labouring of the ship in the troubled sea on this night 1 shall never forget "Will it ever be worse than this?" was a question I had often heard asked, when everything was sliding and bumping about, and when it certainly did seem difficult to comprehend the possibility of anything afloat being more disturbed, without toppling over and going down But what the agitation of a steam-vessel is, on a bad winter's night in the wild Atlantic, it is impossible for the most vivid imagination to conceive To say that she is flung down on her side in the waves, with her masts dipping into them, and that, springing up again, she rolls over on the other side, until a heavy sea strikes her with the noise of a hundred great guns, and hurls her back, that she stops and staggers, and shivers, as though stunned, and then, with a violent throbbing at her heart, darts onward like a monster goaded into madness, to be beaten down, and battered, and crushed, and leaped on by the angry sea, that thunder, lightning, hail, and iain, and wind, are all in fierce contention for the mastery, that every plank has its groan, every nail its shriek, and every drop of water in the great ocean its howling voice—is nothing. To say that all is grand, and all appalling and horrible in the last degree, is nothing. Words cannot express it. Thoughts cannot convey it. Only a dream can call it up again, in all its fury, rage, and passion. And yet, in the very midst of these terrors, I was placed.

in a situation so exquisitely ridiculous, that even then I had as strong a sense of its absurdity as I have now, and could no more help laughing than I can at any other comical incident, happening under circumstances the most favourable to its enjoyment About midnight we shipped a sea, which forced its way through the skylights, burst open the doors above, and came raging and roaring down into the ladies' cabin, to the unspeakable consternation of my wife and a little Scotch lady—who, by the way, had previously sent a message to the captain by the stewardess, requesting him, with her compliments, to have a steel conductor immediately attached to the top of every mast, and to the chimney, in order that the ship might not be struck by lightning They and the handmaid before mentioned, being in such ecstasies of fear that I scarcely knew what to do with them, I naturally bethought myself of some restorative or comfortable cordial, and nothing better occurring to me, at the moment, than hot brandy-and-water, I procured a tumblerful without delay It being impossible to stand or sit without holding on, they were all heaped together in one corner of a long sofa—a fixture extending entirely across the cabin—where they clung to each other in momentary expectation of being drowned When I approached this place with my specific, and was about to administer it with many consolatory expressions to the nearest sufferer, what was my dismay to see them all roll slowly down to the other end! And when I staggered to that end, and held out the glass once more, how immensely baffled were my good intentions by the ship giving another lurch, and their all rolling back again! I suppose I dodged them up and down this sofa for at least a quarter of an hour, without reaching them once, and by the time I did catch them, the brandy-and-water was diminished, by constant spilling, to a teaspoonful To complete the group, it is necessary to recognize in this disconcerted dodger an individual, very pale from sea-sickness, who had shaved his beard and brushed his hair, last, at Liverpool, and whose only articles of dress (linen not included) were a pair of dreadnought trousers, a blue jacket formerly admired upon the Thames at Richmond, no stockings, and one slipper Of the outrageous antics performed by that ship next morning-which made bed a practical joke, and getting up, by any process short of falling out, an impossibility—I say nothing But anything like the utter dreariness and desolation that met my eyes when I literally "tumbled up" on deck at noon, I never saw Ocean and sky were all of one dull, heavy, uniform lead colour There was no extent of prospect even over the dreary waste that lay around us, for the sea ran high, and the horizon encompassed us like a large black hoop. Viewed from the air, or some tall bluff on shore, it would have been imposing and stupendous, no doubt, but seen from the wet and rolling decks, it only impressed one giddily and painfully In the gale of last night the lifeboat had been crushed by one blow of the sea like a walnut shell, and there it hung dangling in the air, a mere fagot of crazy boards The planking of the paddle boxes had been torn sheer away The wheels were exposed and bare, and they whirled and dashed their spray about the decks at random Chimney, white with crusted salt, top-masts struck, stormsails set, rigging all knotted, tangled, wet, and drooping a gloomier picture it would be hard to look upon

I was now comfortably established by courtesy in the ladies' cabin, where, besides ourselves, there were only four other passengers. First, the little Scotch lady before mentioned, on her way to join her husband at New York, who had settled there three years before. Secondly and thirdly, an honest young Yorkshireman, connected with some American house, domiciled in that same city, and carrying thither his beautiful young wife, to whom he had been married but a fortnight, and who was the fairest specimen of a comely English country girl I have ever seen. Fourthly, fifty, and lastly, another couple, newly married too, if one might judge from the endearments they frequently interchanged, of whom I know no more than that they were rather a mysterious, runaway kind of couple, that the lady had great personal attractions also, and that the gentleman carried more guns with him than Robinson Crusoe, wore a shooting coat, and had two great dogs on board. On further consideration, I remember that he tried hot roast pig and bottled ale as a cure for sea sickness, and that he took these remedies (usually in bed) day after day, with astonishing perseverance. I may add, for the information of the curious, that they decidedly failed

The weather continuing obstinately and almost unprecedentedly bad, we usually straggled into this cabin, more or less faint and miserable, about an hour before noon, and lay down on the sofas to recover, during which interval the captain would look in to communicate the state of the wind, the moral certainty of its changing to morrow (the weather is always going to improve to morrow, at sea), the vessel's rate of sailing, and so forth. Observations there were none to tell us of, for there was no sun to take them by But a description of one day will serve for all the rest. Here it is—

The captain being gone, we compose ourselves to read, if the place be light enough, and if not, we doze and talk alternately. At one, a bell rings, and the stewardess comes down with a steaming dish of baked potatoes, and another of roasted apples, and plates of pig's face, cold ham, salt beef, or perhaps a smoking mess of rare hot collops. We fall to upon these dainties, eat as much as we can (we have great appetites now), and are as long as possible about it. If the fire will burn (it will sometimes), we are pretty cheer ful. If it won't, we all remark to each other that it's very cold, rub our hands, cover ourselves with coats and cloaks, and he down again to doze, talk, and read (provided as aforesaid) until dinner-time. At five, another bell rings, and the stewardess reappears with another dish of potatoes—boiled this time—and store of hot meat of various kinds not forgetting the roast pig, to be taken medicinally. We sit down at table again (rather more cheerfully than before), prolong the meal with a rather mouldy dessert of apples, grapes, and oranges, and drink our wine and brandy-and-water The bottles and glasses are still upon the table, and the oranges and so forth are rolling about according to their fancy and the ship's way, when the doctor comes down, by special nightly invitation, to join our evening rubber, immediately on whose arrival we make a party at whist and as it is a rough night and the cards will not lie on the cloth, we put the tricks in our pockets as we take them At whist we remain with exemplary gravity (deducting a short time for tea and toast) until eleven o'clock or thereabouts, when the captain comes down again, in a sou'-wester hat tied under his chin, and a pilot coat, making the ground wet where he stands By this time the card-playing is over, and the bottles and glasses are again upon the table, and after an hour's pleasant conversation about the ship, the passengers, and things in general, the captain (who never goes to bed, and is never out of humour) turns up his coat collar for the deck again, shakes hands all round, and goes laughing out into the weather as merrily as to a birthday party

As to daily news, there is no dearth of that commodity This passenger is reported to have lost fourteen pounds at vingt-et-un in the saloon yesterday, and that passenger drinks his bottle of champagne every day, and how he does it (being only a clerk), nobody knows. The head engineer has distinctly said that there never was such times-meaning weather-and four good hands are ill, and have given in, dead beat Several berths are full of water, and all the cabins are leaky The ship's cook, secretly swigging damaged whisky, has been found drunk, and has been played upon by the fire-engine until quite sober All the stewards have fallen downstairs at various dinner-times, and go about with plasters in various places The baker is ill, and so is the pastrycook A new man, horribly indisposed, has been required to fill the place of the latter officer, and has been propped and jammed up with empty casks in a little house upon deck, and commanded to roll out pie crust, which he protests (being highly bilious) it is death to him to look at News! A dozen murders on shore would lack the interest of these slight incidents at sea

Divided between our rubber and such topics as these, we were running (as we thought) into Halifax Harbour, on the fifteenth night, with little wind and a bright moon-indeed. we had made the light at its outer entrance, and put the pilot in charge—when suddenly the ship struck upon a bank of mud An immediate rush on deck took place, of course. the sides were crowded in an instant, and for a few minutes we were in as lively a state of confusion as the greatest lover of disorder would desire to see The passengers, and guns, and water-casks, and other heavy matters, being all huddled together aft, however, to lighten her in the head, she was soon got off, and after some driving on towards an uncomfortable line of objects (whose vicinity had been announced very early in the disaster by a loud cry of 'Breakers ahead!"), and much backing of paddles and heaving of the lead into a constantly decreasing depth of water, we dropped anchor in a strange outlandish-looking nook which nobody on board could recognize, although there was land all about us, and so close that we could plainly see the waving branches of the trees

It was strange enough, in the silence of midnight, and the dead stillness that seemed to be created by the sudden and unexpected stoppage of the engine which had been clanking and blasting in our ears incessantly for so many days, to watch the look of blank astonishment expressed in every face-beginning with the officers, tracing it through all the passengers, and descending to the very stokers and furnacemen, who emerged from below, one by one, and clustered together in a smoky group about the hatchway of the engineroom, comparing notes in whispers After throwing up a few rockets and firing signal guns in the hope of being hailed from the land, or at least of seeing a light—but without any other sight or sound presenting itself-it was determined to send a boat on shore It was amusing to observe how very kind some of the passengers were in volunteering to go ashore in this same boat-for the general good, of course, not by any means because they thought the ship in an unsafe position, or contemplated the possibility of her heeling over in case the tide were running out. Nor was it less amusing to remark how desperately unpopular the poor pilot became in one short minute He had had his passage out from Liverpool, and during the whole voyage had been quite a notorious character as a teller of anecdotes and cracker of jokes. Yet here were the very men who had laughed the loudest at his jests, now flourishing their fists in his face, loading him with imprecations, and defying him to his teeth as a villain!

The boat soon shoved off, with a lantern and sundry blue lights on board, and in less than an hour returned—the officer in command bringing with him a tolerably tall young tree, which he had plucked up by the roots, to satisfy certain distrustful passengers whose minds misgave them that they were to be imposed upon and shipwrecked, and who would on no other terms believe that he had been ashore, or had done anything but fraudulently row a little way into the mist, specially to deceive them and compass their deaths captain had foreseen from the first that we must be in a place called the Eastern Passage, and so we were It was about the last place in the world in which we had any business or reason to be, but a sudden fog, and some error on the pilot's part, were the cause We were surrounded by banks, and rocks, and shoals of all kinds, but had happily drifted, it seemed, upon the only safe speck that was to be found thereabouts Eased by this report, and by the assurance that the tide was past the ebb, we turned in at three o'clock in the morning

I was dressing, about half-past nine next day, when the noise above hurried me on deck. When I had left it overnight, it was dark, foggy, and damp, and there were bleak hills all round us Now, we were gliding down a smooth, broad stream at the rate of eleven miles an hour, our colours flying gaily, our crew rigged out in their smartest clothes, our officers in uniform again, the sun shining as on a brilliant April day in England, the land stretched out on either side, streaked with light patches of snow, white wooden houses, people at their doors, telegraphs working flags hoisted, wharfs appearing, ships, quays crowded with people, distant noises, shouts, men and boys running down steep places towards the pier, all more bright and gay and fresh to our unused eyes than words can paint them We came to a wharf, paved with uplifted faces, got alongside, and were made fast, after some shouting and straining of cables, darted, a score of us, along the gangway, almost as soon as it was thrust out to meet us, and before it had reached the ship—and leaped upon the firm glad earth again.

I suppose this Halifax would have appeared an Elysium, though it had been a curiosity of ugly dullness. But I carried away with me a most pleasant impression of the town and its inhabitants, and have preserved it to this hour. Nor was it without regret that I came home, without having found an opportunity of returning thither, and once more shaking hands with the friends I made that day

It happened to be the opening of the Legislative Council and General Assembly, at which ceremonial the forms observed on the commencement of a new Session of Parliament in England were so closely copied, and so gravely presented on a small scale, that it was like looking at Westminster through the wrong end of a telescope The governor, as her Majesty's representative, delivered what may be called the Speech from the Throne He said what he had to say manfully and well The military band outside the building struck up "God save the Queen" with great vigour before his Excellency had quite finished, the people shouted, the Ins rubbed their hands, the Outs shook their heads, the Government party said there never was such a good speech, the Opposition declared there never was such a bad one, the Speaker and members of the House of Assembly withdrew from the bar to say a great deal among themselves and do a little, and, in short, everything went on, and promised to go

The town is built on the side of a hill, the highest point being commanded by a strong fortress, not yet quite finished Several streets of good breadth and appearance extend from its summit to the waterside, and are intersected by cross streets running parallel with the river. The houses are chiefly of wood. The market, is abundantly supplied, and provisions are exceedingly cheap. The weather being unusually mild at that time for the season of the year, there was no sleighing, but there were plenty of those vehicles in yards and by-places, and some of them, from the gorgeous quality of their decorations, might have "gone on" without alteration as triumphal cars in a melodrama at Astley's. The

on, just as it does at home upon the like occasions day was uncommonly fine, the air bracing and healthful, the whole aspect of the town cheerful, thriving, and industrious

We lay there seven hours, to deliver and exchange the mails. At length, having collected all our bags and all our passengers (including two or three choice spirits, who, having indulged too freely in oysters and champagne, were found lying insensible on their backs in unfrequented streets), the engines were again put in motion, and we stood off for Boston

Encountering squally weather again in the Bay of Fundy, we tumbled and rolled about as usual all that night and all next day. On the next afternoon—that is to say, on Saturday, the twenty-second of January—an American pilot boat came alongside, and soon afterwards the Britannia steam-packet, from Liverpool, eighteen days out, was telegraphed at Boston

The indescribable interest with which I strained my eyes as the first patches of American soil peeped like molehills from the green sea, and followed them, as they swelled, by slow and almost imperceptible degrees, into a continuous line of coast, can hardly be exaggerated. A sharp keen wind blew dead against us, a hard frost prevailed on shore, and the cold was most severe. Yet the air was so intensely clear, and dry, and bright, that the temperature was not only endurable, but delicious

How I remained on deck, staring about me, until we came alongside the dock, and how, though I had had as many eyes as Argus, I should have had them all wide open, and all employed on new objects—are topics which I will not prolong this chapter to discuss. Neither will I more than hint at my foreigner-like mistake, in supposing that a party of most active persons, who scrambled on board at the peril of their lives as we approached the wharf, were newsmen, answering to that industrious class at home, whereas, despite the leathern wallets of news slung about the necks of some, and the broad sheets in the hands of all, they were Editors, who boarded ships in person (as one gentleman in a worsted comforter informed me), "because they liked the excitement of it" Suffice it in this place to say, that ore of these mvaders, with a ready courtesy for which I thank him here most gratefully, went on before to order rooms at the hotel, and that when I followed, as I soon did I found myself rolling through the long passages with an involuntary imitation of the gait of Mr T P Cooke, in a new nautical melodrama

"Dinner, if you please," said I to the waiter

"When?" said the waiter

"As quick as possible," said I
"Right away?" said the waiter

After a moment's hesitation, I answered "No," at hazaid "Not right away?" cried the waiter, with an amount of surprise that made me start

I looked at him doubtfully, and returned, "No, I would rather have it in this private 100m I like it very much"

At this I really thought the waiter must have gone out of his mind, as I believe he would have done, but for the interposition of another man, who whispered in his ear, "Directly"

"Well! and that's a fact!" said the waiter, looking helplessly at me "right away"

I saw now that "Right away" and "Directly" were one and the same thing So I reversed my previous answer, and sat down to dinner in ten minutes afterwards, and a capital dinner it was

The hotel (a very excellent one) is called the Tremont House. It has more galleries, colonnades, piazzas, and passages than I can remember, or the reader would believe

BOSTON

In all the public establishments of America the utmost courtesy prevails Most of our Departments are susceptible of considerable improvement in this respect, but the Custom-House above all others would do well to take example from the United States, and render itself somewhat less odious and offensive to foreigners. The servile rapacity of the French officials is sufficiently contemptible, but there is a surly boorish incivility about our men, alike disgusting to all persons who fall into their hands, and discreditable to the nation that keeps such ill-conditioned curs snarling about its gates

When I landed in America, I could not help being strongly impressed with the contrast their Custom-House presented, and the attention, politeness, and good-humour with which its officers discharged their duty

As we did not land at Boston, in consequence of some detention at the wharf, until after dark, I received my first impressions of the city in walking down to the Custom House on the morning after our arrival, which was Sunday I am afraid to say, by the way, how many offers of pews and seats in church for that morning were made to us, by formal note of invitation, before we had half finished our first dinner in America, but if I may be allowed to make a moderate guess, without going into nicer calculation, I should say that at least as many sittings were proffered us as would have accommo dated a score or two of grown-up families. The number of creeds and forms of religion to which the pleasure of our company was requested was in very fair proportion.

Not being able, in the absence of any change of clothes, to go to church that day, we were compelled to decline these kindnesses, one and all, and I was reluctantly obliged to forego the delight of hearing Dr Channing, who happened to preach that morning for the first time in a very long interval I mention the name of this distinguished and accomplished man (with whom I soon afterwards had the pleasure of becoming personally acquainted), that I may have the gratification of recording my humble tribute of admiration and respect for his high abilities and character, and for the bold philanthropy with which he has ever opposed himself to that most hideous blot and foul disgrace

-Slavery

To return to Boston When I got into the streets upon this Sunday morning, the air was so clear, the houses were so bright and gay, the signboards were painted in such gaudy colours, the gilded letters were so very golden, the bricks were so very red, the stone was so very white, the blinds and area railings were so very green, the knobs and plates upon the street doors so marvellously bright and twinkling, and all so slight and unsubstantial in appearance, that every thoroughfare in the city looked exactly like a scene in a It rarely happens in the business streets that a pantomime tradesman-if I may venture to call anybody a tradesman where everybody is a merchant—resides above his store, so that many occupations are often carried on in one house, and the whole front is covered with boards and inscriptions I walked along, I kept glancing up at these boards, confidently expecting to see a few of them change into something, and I never turned a corner suddenly without looking out for the Clown and Pantaloon, who, I had no doubt, were hiding in a doorway or behind some pillar close at hand As to Harlequin and Columbine, I discovered immediately that they lodged (they are always looking after lodgings in a pantomime) at a very small clockmaker's, one story high, near the hotel, which, in addition to various symbols and devices, almost covering the whole front, had a great dial hanging out-to be jumped through, of course

The suburbs are, if possible, even more unsubstantial-looking than the city. The white wooden houses (so white that it makes one wink to look at them), with their green jalousie blinds, are so sprinkled and dropped about in all directions, without seeming to have any root at all in the ground, and the small churches and chapels are so prim, and bright, and highly varnished, that I almost believed the whole affair could be taken up piecemeal, like a child's toy, and crammed into a little box

The city is a beautiful one, and cannot fail, I should imagine, to impress all strangers very favourably. The private dwelling-houses are, for the most part, large and elegant, the shops extremely good, and the public buildings handsome. The State House is built upon the summit of a hill, which rises gradually at first, and afterwards by a steep ascent, almost from the water's edge. In front is a green enclosure, called the Common. The site is beautiful, and from the top there is a charming panoramic view of the whole town and neighbourhood. In addition to a variety of commodicus offices, it contains two handsome chambers. in one the House of Representatives of the State hold their meetings, in the other, the Senate Such proceedings as I saw here were conducted with perfect gravity and decorum, and were certainly calculated to inspire attention and respect

There is no doubt that much of the intellectual refinement and superiority of Boston is referable to the quiet influence of the University of Cambridge, which is within three or four miles of the city The resident professors at that university are gentlemen of learning and varied attainments, and are, without one exception that I can call to mind, men who would shed a grace upon, and do honour to, any society in the civilized world Many of the resident gentry in Boston and its neighbourhood, and I think I am not mistaken in adding, a large majority of those who are attached to the liberal professions there, have been educated at this same Whatever the defects of American universities may be, they disseminate no prejudices, rear no bigots, dig up the buried ashes of no old superstitions, never interpose between the people and their improvement, exclude no man because of his religious opinions, above all, in their whole course of study and instruction, recognize a world, and a broad one too, lying beyond the college walls

It was a source of inexpressible pleasure to me to observe the almost imperceptible, but not less certain effect, wrought by this institution among the small community of Boston, and to note at every turn the humanizing tastes and desires it has engendered, the affectionate friendships to which it has given rise, the amount of vanity and prejudice it has dispelled. The golden calf they worship at Boston is a pigmy compared with the giant effigies set up in other parts of that vast counting-house which lies beyond the Atlantic, and the almighty dollar sinks into something comparatively insignificant amidst a whole Pantheon of better gods

Above all, I sincerely believe that the public institutions and charities of this capital of Massachusetts are as nearly perfect as the most considerate wisdom, benevolence, and humanity can make them. I never in my life was more affected by the contemplation of happiness, under circum stances of privation and bereavement, than in my visits to these establishments

It is a great and pleasant feature of all such institutions in America, that they are either supported by the State or assisted by the State, or (in the event of their not needing its helping hand) that they act in concert with it, and are emphatically the people's I cannot but think, with a view to the principle and its tendency to elevate or depress the character of the industrious classes, that a Public Charity is immeasurably better than a Private Foundation, no matter how munificently the latter may be endowed In our own country, where it has not, until within these later days, been a very popular fashion with governments to display any extraordinary regard for the great mass of the people or to recognize their existence as improvable creatures, private charities, unexampled in the history of the earth, have arisen, to do an incalculable amount of good among the destitute and afflicted But the government of the country, having neither act nor part in them, is not in the receipt of any portion of the gratitude they inspire, and offering very little shelter or relief beyond that which is to be found in the workhouse and the fail, has come, not unnaturally, to be looked upon by the poor rather as a stern master, quick to correct and punish, than a kind protector, merciful and vigilant in their hour of need

The maxim that out of evil cometh good, is strongly illustrated by these establishments at home, as the records of the Prerogative Office in Doctors' Commons can abundantly prove Some immensely rich old gentleman or lady, surrounded by needy relatives, makes, upon a low average, a will a week. The old gentleman or lady, never very remarkable in the best of times for good temper, is full of aches and pains from head to foot, full of fancies and caprices. full of spleen, distrust, suspicion, and dislike To cancel old wills, and invent new ones, is at last the sole business of such a testator's existence, and relations and friends (some of whom have been bred up distinctly to inherit a large share of the property, and have been, from their cradles, specially disqualified from devoting themselves to any useful pursuit, on that account) are so often and so unexpectedly and summarily cut off, and reinstated, and cut off again, that the whole family, down to the remotest cousin, is kept in a perpetual fever At length it becomes plain that the old lady or gentleman has not long to live, and the plainer this becomes, the more clearly the old lady or gentleman perceives that everybody is in a conspiracy against their poor old dying relative, wherefore the old lady or gentleman makes another last will—positively the last this time—conceals the same in a china teapot, and expires next day. Then it turns out that the whole of the real and personal estate is divided between half a dozen charities, and that the dead and gone testator has in pure spite helped to do a great deal of good, at the cost of an immense amount of evil passion and misery

The Perkins Institution and Massachusetts Asylum for the Blind, at Boston, is superintended by a body of trustees who make an annual report to the corporation The indigent blind of that state are admitted gratuitously Those from the adjoining state of Connecticut, or from the states of Maine, Vermont, or New Hampshire, are admitted by a warrant from the state to which they respectively belong, or, failing that, must find security among their friends for the payment of about twenty pounds English for their first year's board and instruction, and ten for the second "After the first year," say the trustees, "an account current will be opened with each pupil, he will be charged with the actual cost of his board, which will not exceed two dollars per week* -a trifle more than eight shillings English-"and he will be credited with the amount paid for him by the state, or by his friends, also with his earnings over and above the cost of the stock which he uses, so that all his earnings over one dollar per week will be his own By the third year it will be known whether his earnings will more than pay the actual cost of his board, if they should, he will have it at his option to remain and receive his earnings or not Those who prove unable to earn their own live shood will not be retained, as it is not desirable to convert the establishment into an almshouse, or to retain any but working bees in the hive Those who by physical or mental imbeculity are disqualified for work are thereby disqualified from being members of an industrious community, and they can be better provided for in establishments fitted for the infirm"

I went to see this place one very fine winter morning an Italian sky above, and the air so clear and bright on every side, that even my eyes, which are none of the best, could follow the minute lines and scraps of tracery in distant buildings Like most other public institutions in America of the same class, it stands a mile or two without the town, in a cheerful, healthy spot, and is an airy, spacious, handsome edifice It is built upon a height commanding the harbour When I paused for a moment at the door, and marked how fresh and free the whole scene was-what sparkling bubbles glanced upon the waves, and welled up every moment to the surface, as though the world below, like that above, were radiant with the bright day, and gushing over in its fullness of light, when I gazed from sail to sail away upon a ship at sea, a tiny speck of shining white, the only cloud upon the still, deep, distant blue-and, turning, saw a blind boy with his sightless face addressed that way, as though he too had some sense within him of the glorious distance—I felt a kind of sorrow that the place should be so very light, and a strange wish that for his sake it were darker. It was but momentary, of course, and a mere fancy, but I felt it keenly for all that

The children were at their daily tasks in different rooms, except a few who were already dismissed, and were at play Here, as in many institutions, no uniform is worn, and I was very glad of it, for two reasons. Firstly, because I am sure that nothing but senseless custom and want of thought would reconcile us to the liveries and badges we are so fond of at home. Secondly, because the absence of these things presents each child to the visitor in his or her own proper character, with its individuality unimpaired, not lost in a dull, ugly, monotonous repetition of the same unmeaning garb, which is really an important consideration. The wisdom of encouraging a little harmless pride in personal appearance even among the blind, or the whimsical absurdity of considering charity and leather breeches inseparable companions, as we do, requires no comment.

Good order, cleanliness, and comfort pervaded every corner of the building. The various classes, who were gathered round their teachers, answered the questions put to them with readiness and intelligence, and in a spirit of cheerful contest for precedence which pleased me very much Those who were at play were gleesome and noisy as other children More spiritual and affectionate friendships appeared to exist among them than would be found among other young persons suffering under no deprivation, but this I expected and was prepared to find. It is a part of the great scheme of Heaven's merciful consideration for the afflicted

In a portion of the building set apart for that purpose are workshops for blind persons whose education is finished, and who have acquired a trade, but who cannot pursue it in an ordinary manufactory because of their deprivation Several people were at work here, making brushes, mattresses, and so forth, and the cheerfulness, industry, and good order discernible in every other part of the building extended to this department also

On the ringing of a bell, the pupils all repaired, without any guide or leader, to a spacious music-hall, where they took their seats in an orchestra erected for that purpose, and listened with manifest delight to a voluntary on the organ, played by one of themselves At its conclusion the performer, a boy of nineteen or twenty, gave place to a girl, and to her accompaniment they all sang a hymn, and afterwards a sort of chorus It was very sad to look upon and hear them, happy though their condition unquestionably was, and I saw that one blind girl, who (being for the time deprived of the use of her limbs by illness) sat close beside me with her face towards them, wept silently the while she listened

It is strange to watch the faces of the blind, and see how free they are from all concealment of what is passing in their thoughts, observing which, a man with eyes may blush to contemplate the mask he wears Allowing for one shade of anxious expression which is never absent from their countenances, and the like of which we may readily detect in our own faces if we try to feel our way in the dark, every idea, as it rises within them, is expressed with the lightning's speed and nature's truth If the company at a rout, or drawingroom at court, could only for one time be as unconscious of the eyes upon them as blind men and women are, what secrets would come out, and what a worker of hypocrisy this sight, the loss of which we so much pity, would appear to be!

The thought occurred to me as I sat down in another room, before a girl, blind, deaf, and dumb, destitute of smell, and nearly so of taste before a fair young creature with every human faculty, and hope, and power of goodness and affection, enclosed within her delicate frame, and but one outward sense—the sense of touch. There she was, before me, built up, as it were, in a marble cell, impervious to any ray of light or particle of sound, with her poor white hand peeping through a chink in the wall, beckoning to some good man for help, that an Immortal soul might be awakened

Long before I looked upon her, the help had come Her face was radiant with intelligence and pleasure. Her hair, braided by her own hands, was bound about a head whose intellectual capacity and development were beautifully expressed in its graceful outline and its broad open brow, her dress, arranged by herself, was a pattern of neatness and simplicity. The work she had knitted lay beside her, her writing-book was on the desk she leaned upon. From the mournful ruin of such bereavement there had slowly risen up this gentle, tender, guileless, grateful-hearted being

Like other inmates of that house, she had a green ribbon bound round her eyelids. A doll she had dressed lay near upon the ground. I took it up, and saw that she had made a green fillet such as she wore herself, and fastened it about its mimic eyes.

She was seated in a little enclosure, made by school desks and forms, writing her daily journal But soon finishing this pursuit, she engaged in an animated communication with a teacher who sat beside her. This was a favourite mistress with the poor pupil If she could see the face of her fair instructress, she would not love her less, I am sure.

I have extracted a few disjointed fragments of her history, from an account written by that one man who has made her what she is. It is a very beautiful and touching narrative, and I wish. I could present it entire

over, New Hampshire, on the twenty-first of December 1829 She is described as having been a very sprightly and pretty infant, with bright blue eyes. She was, however, so puny and feeble until she was a year and a half old, that her parents hardly hoped to rear her. She was subject to severe fits, which seemed to rack her frame almost beyond her power of endurance, and life was held by the feeblest tenure, but when a year and a half old she seemed to rally, the dangerous symptoms subsided, and at twenty months old she was perfectly well

"Then her mental powers, hitherto stinted in their growth, rapidly developed themselves, and during the four months of health which she enjoyed, she appears (making due allowance for a fond mother's account) to have displayed a considerable degree of intelligence

"But suddenly she sickened again, her disease raged with great violence during five weeks, when her eyes and ears were inflamed, suppurated, and their contents were discharged. But though sight and hearing were gone for ever, the poor child's sufferings were not ended. The fever raged during seven weeks, for five months she was kept in bed in a darkened room, it was a year before she could walk unsupported, and two years before she could sit up all day. It was now observed that her sense of smell was almost entirely destroyed, and consequently that her taste was much blunted

"It was not until four years of age that the poor child's bodily health seemed restored, and she was able to enter upon her apprenticeship of life and the world

"But what a situation was hers! The darkness and the silence of the tomb were around her. No mother's smile called forth her answering smile, no father's voice taught her to imitate his sounds, they, brothers and sisters, were but forms of matter which resisted her touch, but which differed not from the furniture of the house, save in warmth, and in the power of locomotion, and not even in these respects from the dog and the cat

"But the immortal spirit which had been implanted within her could not die, nor be maimed nor mutilated, and though most of its avenues of communication with the world were cut off, it began to manifest itself through the others. As soon as she could walk she began to explore the room, and then the house, she became familiar with the form, density, weight and heat, of every article she could lay her hands upon. She followed her mother, and felt her hands and arms, as she was occupied about the house, and her disposition to imitate led her to repeat everything herself. She even learned to sew a little, and to knit."

The reader will scarcely need to be told, however, that the opportunities of communicating with her were very, very limited, and that the moral effects of her wretched state soon began to appear. Those who cannot be enlightened by reason, can only be controlled by force, and this, coupled with her great privations, must soon have reduced her to a worse condition than that of the beasts that pensh, but for timely and unhoped-for aid

"At this time, I was so fortunate as to hear of the child, and immediately hastened to Hanover to see her I found her with a well-formed figure, a strongly-marked, nervous-sanguine temperament, a large and beautifully-shaped head, and the whole system in healthy action. The parents were easily induced to consent to her coming to Boston, and on the 4th of October, 1837, they brought her to the Institution.

"For a while she was much bewildered, and after waiting about two weeks, until she became acquainted with her new locality, and somewhat familiar with the inmates, the attempt was made to give her knowledge of arbitrary signs, by which she could interchange thoughts with others

"There was one of two ways to be adopted either to go on to build up a language of signs on the basis of the natural language which she had already commenced herself, or to teach her the purely arbitrary language in common use—that is, to give her a sign for every individual thing, or to give her a knowledge of letters by combination of which she might express her idea of the existence, and the mode and condition of existence, of anything The former would have been easy, but very ineffectual, the latter seemed very difficult, but, if accomplished, very effectual I determined, therefore, to try the latter

"The first experiments were made by taking articles in common use, such as knives, forks, spoons, keys, etc., and pasting upon them labels with their names printed in raised letters. These she felt very carefully, and soon, of course, distinguished that the crooked lines $s \not p o o n$, differed as much from the crooked lines k e y, as the spoon differed from the key in form

"Then small detached labels, with the same words printed upon them, were put into her hands, and she soon observed that they were similar to the ones pasted on the articles. She showed her perception of this similarity by laying the label key upon the key, and the label spoon upon the spoon. She was encouraged here by the natural sign of

"The same process was then repeated with all the articles which she could handle, and she very easily learned to place the proper labels upon them. It was evident, however, that the only intellectual exercise was that of imitation and memory. She recollected that the label book was placed upon a book, and she repeated the process first from imitation, next from memory, with only the motive of love of approbation, but apparently without the intellectual perception of any relation between the things

"After a while, instead of labels, the individual letters were given to her on detached bits of paper they were arranged side by side so as to spell book, key, etc. Then they were mixed up in a heap, and a sign was made for her to arrange them herself so as to express the words book, key, etc., and she did so

"Hitherto, the process had been mechanical, and the success about as great as teaching a very knowing dog a variety of tricks. The poor child had sat in mute amazement, and patiently imitated everything her teacher did, but now the truth began to flash upon her—her intellect began to work. She perceived that here was a way by which she could herself make up a sign of anything that was in her own mind, and show it to another mind, and at once her countenance lighted up with a human expression. It was no longer a dog, or parrot, it was an immortal spirit, eagerly seizing upon a new link of union with other spirits? I could almost fix upon the moment when this truth dawned upon her mind, and spread its light to her countenance. I saw that the great obstacle was overcome, and that henceforward nothing but patient and persevering, but plain and straightforward, efforts were to be used

"The result thus far is quickly related, and easily conceived, but not so was the process, for many weeks of apparently unprofitable labour were passed before it was effected

"When it was said above that a sign was made, it was intended to say that the action was performed by her teacher, she follows her bonds and then unitating the motion

she feeling his hands, and then imitating the motion

"The next step was to procure a set of metal types, with the different letters of the alphabet cast upon their ends, also a board, in which were square holes, into which holes she could set the types, so that the letters on their ends could alone be felt above the surface

"Then, on any article being handed to her—for instance, a pencil or a watch—she would select the component letters, and arrange them on her board, and read them with apparent

pleasure

"She was exercised for several weeks in this way, until her vocabulary became extensive, and then the important step was taken of teaching her how to represent the different letters by the position of her fingers, instead of the cumbrous apparatus of the board and types She accomplished this speedily and easily, for her intellect had begun to work in aid

"This was the period, about three months after she had commenced, that the first report of her case was made, in which it is stated that 'she has just learned the manual alphabet, as used by the deaf mutes, and it is a subject of delight and wonder to see how rapidly, correctly, and eagerly she goes on with her labours. Her teacher gives her a new object—for instance, a pencil, first lets her examine it, and get an idea of its use, then teaches her how to spell it by making the signs for the letters with her own fingers. The child grasps her hand, and feels her fingers, as the different letters are formed. She turns her head a little on one side, like a person listening closely, her lips are apart, she seems scarcely to, breathe, and her countenance, at first anxious, gradually changes to a smile, as she comprehends the lesson,

She then holds up her tiny fingers, and spells the word in the manual alphabet, next, she takes her types and arranges her letters, and last, to make sure that she is right, she takes the whole of the types composing the word, and places them upon or in contact with the pencil, or whatever the object may be'

"The whole of the succeeding year was passed in gratifying her eager inquiries for the names of every object which she could possibly handle, in exercising her in the use of the manual alphabet, in extending in every possible way her knowledge of the physical relations of things, and in proper care of her health

"At the end of the year a report of her case was made,

"It has been ascertained beyond the possibility of doubt that she cannot see a ray of light, cannot hear the least sound, and never exercises her sense of smell, if she have any. Thus her mind dwells in darkness and stillness, as profound as that of a closed tomb at midnight. Of beautiful sights, and sweet sounds, and pleasant odours, she has no conception. Nevertheless, she seems as happy and playful as a bird or a lamb, and the employment of her intellectual faculties, or the acquirement of a new idea, gives her a vivid pleasure, which is plainly marked in her expressive features. She never seems to repine, but has all the buoyancy and gaiety of childhood. She is fond of fun and frolic, and when playing with the rest of the children, her shrill laugh sounds loudest of the group.

""When left alone, she seems very happy if she have her knitting or sewing, and will busy herself for hours. If she have no occupation, she evidently amuses herself by imaginary dialogues, or by recalling past impressions, she counts with her fingers, or spells out names of things which she has recently learned, in the manual alphabet of the deaf mutes. In this lonely self-communion she seems to reason, reflect, and argue if she spell a word wrong with the fingers of her right hand, she instantly strikes it with her left, as her teacher does, in sign of disapprobation, if right, then she pats herself upon the head, and looks pleased. She sometimes purposely spells a word wrong with the left hand, looks roguish for a moment, and laughs, and then with the right hand strikes the left, as if to correct it

"'During the year she has attained great dexterity in the use of the manual alphabet of the deaf mutes, and she spells out the words and sentences which she knows so fast and so deftly, that only those accustomed to this language can follow

"'But wonderful as is the rapidity with which she writes her thoughts upon the air, still more so is the ease and accuracy with which she reads the words thus written by another-grasping their hands in hers, and following every movement of their fingers, as letter after letter conveys their meaning to her mind It is in this way that she converses with her blind playmates, and nothing can more forcibly show the power of mind in forcing matter to its purpose than a meeting between them. For if great talent and skill are necessary for two pantomimes to paint their thoughts and feelings by the movements of the body, and the expression of the countenance, how much greater the difficulty when darkness shrouds them both, and the one can hear no sound

""When Laura is walking through a passage way, with her hands spread before her, she knows instantly every one she meets, and passes them with a sign of recognition it be a girl of her own age, and especially if it be one of her favourites, there is instantly a bright smile of recognition, a twining of arms, a grasping of hands, and a swift telegraphing upon the tiny fingers, whose rapid evolutions convey the thoughts and feelings from the outposts of one mind to those of the other There are questions and answers, exchanges of joy or sorrow, there are kissings and partings, just as between little children with all their senses?

"During this year and six months after she had left home, her mother came to visit her, and the scene of their meeting was an interesting one

"The mother stood some time gazing with overflowing eyes upon her unfortunate child; who, all unconscious of her presence, was playing about the room Presently Laura ran against her, and at once began feeling her hands, examining her dress, and trying to find out if she knew her, but not succeeding in this, she turned away as from a stranger, and the poor woman could not conceal the pang she felt at finding that her beloved child did not know her

"She then gave Laura a string of beads which she used to wear at home, which were recognized by the child at once, who, with much joy, put them around her neck, and sought me eagerly to say she understood the string was from her home

"The mother now tried to caress her, but poor Laura

"Another article from home was now given her, and she began to look much interested. She examined the stranger much closer, and gave me to understand that she knew she came from Hanover, she even endured her caresses, but would leave her with indifference at the slightest signal. The distress of the mother was now painful to behold, for although she had feared that she should not be recognized, the painful reality of being treated with cold indifference by a darling child was too much for woman's nature to bear

"After a while, on the mother taking hold of her again, a vague idea seemed to flit across Laura's mind that this could not be a stranger. She therefore felt her hands very eagerly, while her countenance assumed an expression of intense interest. She became very pale, and then suddenly red, hope seemed struggling with doubt and anxiety, and never were contending emotions more strongly painted upon the human face. At this moment of painful uncertainty, the mother drew her close to her side, and kissed her fondly, when at once the truth flashed upon the child, and all mistrust and anxiety disappeared from her face, as with an expression of exceeding joy she eagerly nestled to the bosom of her parent, and yielded herself to her fond embraces

"After this, the beads were all unheeded, the playthings which were offered to her were utterly disregarded, her playmates, for whom but a moment before she gladly left the stranger, now vainly strove to pull her from her mother, and though she yielded her usual instantaneous obedience to my signal to follow me, it was evidently with painful reluctance. She clung close to me, as if bewildered and fearful, and when, after a moment, I took her to her mother, she sprang to her arms and clung to her with eager joy

"The subsequent parting between them showed alike the affection, the intelligence, and the resolution of the child

close to her all the way, until they arrived at the threshold, where she paused, and felt around, to ascertain who was near her Perceiving the matron, of whom she is very fond, she grasped her with one hand, holding on convulsively to her mother with the other, and thus she stood for a moment Then she dropped her mother's hand, put her handkerchief to her eyes, and turning round clung sobbing to the matron, while her mother departed, with emotions as deep as those of her child

"It has been remarked in former reports that she can distinguish different degrees of intellect in others, and that she soon regarded, almost with contempt, a newcomer, when, after a few days, she discovered her weakness of mind This unamiable part of her character has been more strongly developed during the past year

"She chooses for her friends and companions those children who are intelligent, and can talk best with her, and she evidently dislikes to be with those who are deficient in intellect, unless, indeed, she can make them serve her purposes, which she is evidently inclined to do She takes advantage of them, and makes them wait upon her, in a manner that she knows she could not exact of others, and in various ways she shows her Saxon blood

"She is fond of having other children noticed and caressed by the teachers, and those whom she respects, but this must not be carried too far, or she becomes jealous. She wants to have her share, which, if not the lion's, is the greater part, and if she does not get it, she says, 'My mother will love me'

"Her tendency to imitation is so strong, that it leads her to actions which must be entirely incomprehensible to her, and which can give her no other pleasure than the gratification of an internal faculty. She has been known to sit for half an hour holding a book before her sightless eyes, and moving her lips, as she has observed seeing people do when reading

"She one day pretended that her doll was sick, and went through all the motions of tending it, and giving it medicine. She then put it carefully to bed, and placed a bottle of hot water to its feet, laughing all the time most heartily When I came home, she insisted upon my going to see it, and feel is pulse, and when I told her to put a blister on its back, she seemed to enjoy it amazingly, and almost screamed with

"Her social feelings, and her affections, are very strong, and when she is sitting at work, or at her studies, by the side of one of her little friends, she will break off from her task every few moments, to hug and kiss them with an earnestness and warmth that is touching to behold

"When left alone, she occupies and apparently amuses herself, and seems quite contented, and so strong seems to be the natural tendency of thought to put on the garb of language, that she often soliloquizes in the finger language, slow and tedious as it is But it is only when alone that she is quiet, for if she becomes sensible of the presence of any one near her, she is restless until she can sit close beside them, hold their hand, and converse with them by signs

"In her intellectual character it is pleasing to observe an insatiable thirst for knowledge, and a quick perception of the relations of things. In her moral character it is beautiful to behold her continual gladness, her keen enjoyment of existence, her expansive love, her unhesitating confidence, her sympathy with suffering, her conscientiousness, truthfulness,

Such are a few fragments from the simple but most interesting and instructive history of Laura Bridgman. The name of her great benefactor and friend, who writes it, is Dr. Howe. There are not many persons, I hope and believe, who, after reading these passages, can ever hear that name with indifference.

A further account has been published by Dr Howe, since the report from which I have just quoted. It describes her rapid mental growth and improvement during twelve months more, and brings her little listory down to the end of last year. It is very remarkable, that as we dream in words, and carry on imaginary conversations, in which we speak both for ourselves and for the shadows who appear to us in those visions of the night, so she, having no words, uses her finger alphabet in her sleep. And it has been ascertained that when her slumber is broken, and is much disturbed by dreams, she expresses her thoughts in an irregular and con fused manner on her fingers, just as we should murmur and mutter them indistinctly in the like circumstances

I turned over the leaves of her Diary, and found it written in a fair legible square hand, and expressed in terms which were quite intelligible without any explanation. On my saying that I should like to see her write again, the teacher who sat beside her bade her, in their language, sign her name upon a slip of paper twice or thrice. In doing so, I observed that she kept her left hand always touching, and following up, her right, in which, of course, she held the pen No line was indicated by any contrivance, but she wrote

straight and freely

She had until now been quite unconscious of the presence of visitors, but having her hand placed in that of the gentleman who accompanied me, she immediately expressed his name upon her teacher's palm. Indeed, her sense of touch is now so exquisite, that having been acquainted with a person once, she can recognize him or her after almost any interval. This gentleman had been in her company, I believe, but very seldom, and certainly had not seen her for many months. My hand she rejected at once, as she does that of any man who is a stranger to her. But she retained my wife's with evident pleasure, kissed her, and examined her dress with a girl's curiosity and interest.

She was merry and cheerful, and showed much innocent playfulness in her intercourse with her teacher. Her delight on recognizing a favourite playfellow and companion—herself a blind girl—who silently, and with an equal enjoyment of the coming surprise, took a seat beside her, was beautiful to witness. It elicited from her at first, as other slight circumstances did twice or thrice during my visit, an uncouth noise which was rather painful to hear. But on her teacher touching her lips, she immediately desisted, and embraced her laughingly and affectionately

I had previously been into another chamber, where a number of blind boys were swinging, and climbing, and engaged in various sports. They all clamoured, as we entered, to the assistant-master, who accompanied us, "Look at me, Mr Hart! Please, Mr Hart, look at me!" evincing,

I thought, even in this, an anxiety peculiar to their condition, that their little feats of agility should be seen. Among them was a small, laughing fellow, who stood aloof, entertaining himself with a gymnastic exercise for bringing the arms and chest into play, which he enjoyed mightily, especially when, in thrusting out his right arm, he brought it into contact with another boy. Like Laura Bridgman, this young child was deaf, and dumb, and blind

Dr Howe's account of this pupil's first instruction is so very striking, and so intimately connected with Laura herself, that I cannot refrain from a short extract. I may premise that the poor boy's name is Oliver Caswell, that he is thirteen years of age, and that he was in full possession of all his faculties until three years and four months old. He was then attacked by scarlet fever, in four weeks became deaf, in a few weeks more, blind, in six months, dumb He showed his anxious sense of this last deprivation, by often feeling the lips of other persons when they were talking, and then putting his hand upon his own, as if to assure himself that he had them in the right position

"His thirst for knowledge," says Dr Howe, "proclaimed itself as soon as he entered the house, by his eager examination of everything he could feel or smell in his new location. For instance, treading upon the register of a furnace, he instantly stooped down and began to feel it, and soon discovered the way in which the upper plate moved upon the lower one. But this was not enough for him, so lying down upon his face, he applied his tongue first to one, then to the other, and seemed to discover that they were

"His signs were expressive, and the strictly natural language, laughing, crying, sighing, kissing, embracing, etc, was perfect

"Some of the analogical signs which (guided by his faculty of imitation) he had contrived, were comprehensible—such as the waving motion of his hand for the motion of a boat, the circular one for a wheel, etc

"The first object was to break up the use of these signs, and to substitute for them the use of purely arbitrary ones

"Profiting by the experience I had gained in the other cases, I omitted several steps of the process before employed, and commenced at once with the finger language Taking, therefore, several articles having short names, such as key, cup, mug, etc., and with Laura for an auxiliary, I sat down, and taking his hand, placed it upon one of them, and then with my own made the letters key He felt my hands eagerly with both of his, and on my repeating the process, he evidently tried to imitate the motions of my fingers In a few minutes he contrived to feel the motions of my fingers with one hand, and holding out the other he tried to imitate them, laughing most heartily when he succeeded was by, interested even to agitation, and the two presented a singular sight her face was flushed and anxious, and her fingers twined in among ours so closely as to follow every motion, but so lightly as not to embarrass them, while Oliver stood attentive, his head a little aside, his face turned up, his left hand grasping mine, and his right held out. At every motion of my fingers his countenance betokened keen attention, there was an expression of anxiety as he tried to imitate the motions, then a smile came stealing out as he thought he could do so, and spread into a joyous laugh the moment he succeeded, and felt me pat his head, and Laura clap him heartily upon the back, and jump up and down in her joy

"He learned more than a half-dozen letters in half an hour, and seemed delighted with his success, at least in gaining approbation. His attention then began to flag, and I commenced playing with him. It was evident that in all this he had merely been imitating the motions of my fingers, and placing his hand upon the key, cup, etc., as part of the process, without any perception of the relation between the sign and the object

"When he was tired with play I took him back to the table, and he was quite ready to begin again his process of imitation. He soon learned to make the letters for key, pen, pin, and by having the object repeatedly placed in his hand, he at last perceived the relation I wished to establish between them. This was evident, because, when I made the letters pin, or pen, or cup, he would select the article

"The perception of this relation was not accompanied by that radiant flash of intelligence and that glow of joy which marked the delightful moment when Laura first perceived it. I then placed all the articles on the table, and going away a little distance with the children, placed Oliver's fingers in the positions to spell key, on which Laura went and brought the article. The little fellow seemed to be much amused by this, and looked very attentive and smiling. I then caused him to make the letters bread, and in an instant Laura went and brought him a piece. He smelled at it, put it to his lips, cocked up his head with a most knowing look, seemed to reflect a moment, and then laughed outright, as much as to say, 'Aha! I understand now how something may be made out of this'

"It was now clear that he had the capacity and inclination to learn, that he was a proper subject for instruction, and needed only persevering attention. I therefore put him in the hands of an intelligent teacher, nothing doubting of his rapid progress"

Well may this gentleman call that a delightful moment, in which some distant promise of her present state first gleamed upon the darkened mind of Laura Bridgman Throughout his life, the recollection of that moment will be to him a source of pure, unfading happiness, nor will it shine less brightly on the evening of his days of Noble Usefulness

The affection which exists between these two—the master and the pupil—is as far removed from all ordinary care and regard, as the circumstances in which it has had its growth are apart from the common occurrences of life. He is occupied now in devising means of imparting to her higher knowledge, and of conveying to her some adequate idea of the Great Creator of that universe in which, dark and silent and scentless though it be to her, she has such deep delight

Ye who have eyes and see not, and have ears and hear not, ye who are as the hypocrites of sad countenances, and disfigure your faces that ye may seem unto men to fast, learn healthy cheerfulness and mild contentment from the deaf, and dumb, and blind! Self-elected saints with gloomy brows, this sightless, earless, voiceless child may teach you lessons you will do well to follow. Let that poor hand of hers he gently on your hearts, for there may be something in its healing touch akin to that of the Great Master whose precepts you misconstrue, whose lessons you pervert, of whose charity and sympathy with all the world not one among you in his daily practice knows as much as many of the worst among those fallen sinners, to whom you are liberal in nothing but the preachment of perdition!

As I rose to quit the room, a pretty little child of one of the attendants came running in to greet its father. For the moment, a child with eyes, among the sightless crowd, impressed me almost as painfully as the blind boy in the porch had done two hours ago. Ah! how much brighter and more deeply blue, glowing and rich though it had been before, was the scene without, contrasting with the darkness of so many youthful lives within!

At South Boston, as it is called, in a situation excellently adapted for the purpose, several charitable institutions are clustered together. One of these is the State Hospital for the insane, admirably conducted on those enlightened principles of conciliation and kindness which, twenty years ago, would have been worse than heretical, and which have been acted upon with so much success in our own pauper Asylum at Hanwell. "Evince a desire to show some confidence and repose some trust even in mad people," said the resident physician, as we walked along the galleries, his patients flocking round us unrestrained. Of those who deny or doubt the wisdom of this maxim after witnessing its effects, if there be such people still alive, I can only say that I hope I may never be summoned as a Juryman on a Commission of Lunacy whereof they are the subjects, for I should certainly find them out of their senses, on such evidence alone

Each ward in this institution is shaped like a long gallery or hall, with the dormitories of the patients opening from it on either hand. Here they work, read, play at skittles, and other games, and when the weather does not admit of their taking exercise out of doors, pass the day together. In one of these rooms, seated calmly, and quite as a matter of course, among a throng of madwomen, black and white, were the physician's wife and another lady, with a couple of children. These ladies were graceful and handsome, and it was not difficult to perceive at a glance that even their presence there had a highly beneficial influence on the patients who were grouped about them

Leaning her head against the chimney-piece, with a great assumption of dignity and refinement of manner, sat an elderly female, in as many scraps of finery as Madge Wildfire herself. Her head in particular was so strewn with scraps of gauze and cotton and bits of paper, and had so many queer odds and ends stuck all about it, that it looked like a bird'snest. She was radiant with imaginary jewels, wore a rich pair of undoubted gold spectacles, and gracefully dropped upon her lap, as we approached, a very old greasy newspaper, in which I dare say she had been reading an account of her own presentation at some Foreign Court

I have been thus particular in describing her, because she will serve to exemplify the physician's manner of acquiring and retaining the confidence of his patients

"This," he said aloud, taking me by the hand, and advancing to the fantastic figure with great politeness—not raising her suspicions by the slightest look or whisper, or any kind of aside, to me—"this lady is the hostess of this mansion, sir. It belongs to her. Nobody else has anything whatever to do with it. It is a large establishment, as you see, and requires a great number of attendants. She lives, you observe, in the very first style. She is kind enough to receive my visits, and to permit my wife and family to reside here, for which, it is hardly necessary to say, we are much indebted to her. She is exceedingly courteous, you perceive"—on this hint she bowed condescendingly—"and will permit me to have the pleasure of introducing you—A gentleman from England, Ma'am, newly arrived from England, after a very tempestuous passage. Mr. Dickens—the lady of the house!"

We exchanged the most dignified salutations with profound gravity and respect, and so went on The rest of the madwomen seemed to understand the joke perfectly (not only in this case, but in all the others, except their own), and to be highly amused by it. The nature of their several kinds of insanity was made known to me in the same way, and we left each of them in high good-humour Not only is a thorough confidence established, by these means, between physician and patient, in respect of the nature and extent of their hallucinations, but it is easy to understand that opportunities are afforded for seizing any moment of reason, to startle them by placing their own delusion before them in its most incongruous and ridiculous light

Every patient in this asylum sits down to dinner every day with a knife and fork, and in the midst of them sits the gentleman whose manner of dealing with his charges I have just described. At every meal, moral influence alone restrains the more violent among them from cutting the throats of the rest, but the effect of that influence is reduced to an absolute certainty, and is found, even as a means of restraint, to say nothing of it as a means of cure, a hundred times more efficacious than all the strait-waistcoats, fetters and handcuffs, that ignorance, piejudice, and cruelty have manufactured since the creation of the world

In the labour department, every patient is as freely trusted with the tools of his trade as if he were a sane man. In the garden and on the farm they work with spades, rakes, and hoes. For amusement, they walk, run, fish, paint, read, and ride out to take the air in carriages provided for the purpose. They have among themselves a sewing society to make clothes for the poor, which holds meetings, passes resolutions, never comes to fisticulfs or bowie-knives as sane assemblies have been known to do elsewhere, and conducts all its proceedings with the greatest decorum. The irritability, which would otherwise be expended on their own flesh, clothes, and furniture, is dissipated in these pursuits. They are cheerful, tranquil, and healthy

Once a week they have a ball, in which the doctor and his family, with all the nurses and attendants, take an active part. Dances and marches are performed alternately, to the enlivening strains of a piano, and now and then some gentleman or lady (whose proficiency has been previously ascertained) obliges the company with a song. Nor does it ever degenerate, at a tender crisis, into a screech or howl, wherein, I must confess, I should have thought the danger lay. At an early hour they all meet together for these festive purposes, at eight o'clock refreshments are served, and at nine they separate

throughout They all take their tone from the doctor, and he moves a very Chesterfield among the company Like other assemblies, these entertainments afford a fruitful topic of conversation among the ladies for some days, and the gentlemen are so anxious to shine on these occasions, that they have been sometimes found "practising their steps" in private, to cut a more distinguished figure in the dance

It is obvious that one great feature of this system, is the inculcation and encouragement, even among such unhappy persons, of a decent self-respect. Something of the same spirit pervades all the institutions at South Boston

There is the House of Industry In that branch of it which is devoted to the reception of old or otherwise helpless paupers, these words are painted on the walls "Worthy SELF-GOVERNMENT, QUIETUDE AND PEACE ARE BLESSINGS" It is not assumed and taken for granted that being there they must be evil-disposed and wicked people, before whose vicious eyes it is necessary to flourish threats and harsh restraints They are met at the very threshold with this mild appeal All within-doors is very plain and simple, as it ought to be, but arranged with a view to peace and comfort It costs no more than any other plan of arrangement, but it bespeaks an amount of consideration for those who are reduced to seek a shelter there, which puts them at once upon their gratitude and good behaviour Instead of being parcelled out in great, long, rambling wards, where a certain amount of weazen life may mope, and pine, and shiver all day long, the building is divided into separate rooms, each with its share of light and air. In these, the better kind of paupers live They have a motive for exertion and becoming pride, in the desire to make these little chambers comfortable and decent

I do not remember one but it was clean and neat, and had its plant or two upon the window-sill, or row of crockery upon the shelf, or small display of coloured prints upon the whitewashed wall, or, perhaps, its wooden clock behind the door

The orphans and young children are in an adjoining building, separate from this, but a part of the same Institution Some are such little creatures, that the stairs are of Lilliputian measurement, fitted to their tiny strides The same consideration for their years and weakness is expressed in their very seats, which are perfect curiosities, and look like articles of furniture for a pauper doll's-house — I can imagine the glee of our Poor Law Commissioners at the notion of these seats having arms and backs, but small spines being of older date than their occupation of the Board-room at Somerset House, I thought even this provision very merciful and kind

Here, again. I was greatly pleased with the inscriptions on the wall, which were scraps of plain morality, easily remembered and understood such as "Love one another"-"God remembers the smallest creature in His creation," and straightforward advice of that nature The books and tasks of these smallest of scholars were adapted, in the same judicious manner, to their childish powers When we had examined these lessons, four morsels of girls (of whom one was blind) sang a little song, about the merry month of May, which I thought (being extremely dismal) would have suited an English November better That done, we went to see their sleeping-rooms on the floor above, in which the arrangements were no less excellent and gentle than those we had seen below And after observing that the teachers were of a class and character well suited to the spirit of the place, I took leave of the infants with a lighter heart than ever I have taken leave of pauper infants yet

Connected with the House of Industry, there is also an Hospital, which was in the best order, and had, I am glad to say, many beds unoccupied. It had one fault, however, which is common to all American interiors—the presence of the eternal, accursed, suffocating, red-hot demon of a stove, whose breath would blight the purest air under heaven

There are two establishments for boys in this same neighbourhood. One is called the Boylston school, and is an asylum for neglected and indigent boys who have committed no crime, but who, in the ordinary course of things, would very soon be purged of that distinction if they were not taken from the hungry streets and sent here. The other is a House of Reformation for Juvenile Offenders. They are both under the same roof, but the two classes of boys never come in contact.

The Boylston boys, as may be readily supposed, have very much the advantage of the others in point of personal appear ance. They were in their schoolroom when I came upon them, and answered correctly, without book, such questions as, where was England? how far was it? what was its population, its capital city, its form of government? and so forth They sang a song too, about a farmer sowing his seed, with corresponding action at such parts as "its thus he sows," "he turns him round," "he claps his hands," which gave it greater interest for them, and accustomed them to act together in an orderly manner. They appeared exceedingly well taught, and not better taught than fed, for a more chubby-looking, full-waistcoated set of boys I never saw

The juvenile offenders had not such pleasant faces by a great deal, and in this establishment there were many boys of I saw them first at their work (basket-making, and the manufacture of palm-leaf hats), afterwards in their school, where they sang a chorus in praise of Liberty—an odd, and, one would think, rather aggravating theme for prisoners These boys are divided into four classes, each denoted by a numeral, worn on a badge upon the arm On the arrival of a newcomer, he is put into the fourth or lowest class, and left, by good behaviour, to work his way up into the first The design and object of this Institution is to reclaim the youthful criminal by firm but kind and judicious treatment, to make his prison a place of purification and improvement, not of demoralization and corruption, to impress upon him that there is but one path, and that one sober industry, which can ever lead him to happiness, to teach him how it may be trodden, if his footsteps have never yet been led that way, and to lure him back to it if they have strayed in a word, to snatch him from destruction, and restore him to society a penitent and useful member The importance of such an establishment, in every point of view, and with reference to every consideration of humanity and social policy, requires no comment

One other establishment closes the catalogue It is the House of Correction for the State, in which silence is strictly maintained, but where the prisoners have the comfort and mental relief of seeing each other, and of working together This is the improved system of Prison Discipline which we have imported into England, and which has been in successful operation among us for some years past

America, as a new and not over-populated country, has in all her prisons the one great advantage of being enabled to find useful and profitable work for the immates, whereas, with us, the prejudice against prison labour is naturally very strong, and almost insurmountable, when honest men who have hot offended against the laws are frequently doomed to seek employment in vain. Even in the United States, the principle of bringing convict labour and free labour into a competition which must obviously be to the disadvantage of the latter, has already found many opponents, whose number

For this very reason though, our best prisons would seem at the first glance to be better conducted than those of America The treadmill is accompanied with little or no noise. five hundred men may pick oakum in the same room, without a sound, and both kinds of labour admit of such keen and vigilant superintendence, as will render even a word of personal communication among the prisoners almost impos-On the other hand, the noise of the loom, the forge. the carpenter's hammer, or the stonemason's saw, greatly favours those opportunities of intercourse—hurried and brief. no doubt, but opportunities still-which these several kinds of work, by rendering it necessary for men to be employed very near to each other, and often side by side, without any barrier or partition between them, in their very nature pre-A visitor, too, requires to reason and reflect a little, before the sight of a number of men engaged in ordinary labour, such as he is accustomed to out of doors, will impress him half as strongly as the contemplation of the same persons in the same place and garb would, if they were occupied in some task marked and degraded everywhere as belonging only to felons in fails In an American state prison or house of correction, I found it difficult at first to persuade myself that I was really in a jail-a place of ignominious punishment and endurance And to this hour I very much question whether the humane boast that it is not like one, has its root in the true wisdom or philosophy of the matter

I hope I may not be misunderstood on this subject, for it is one in which I take a strong and deep interest. I incline as little to the sickly feeling which makes every canting lie or maudlin speech of a notorious criminal a subject of newspaper report and general sympathy, as I do to those good old customs of the good old times which made England, even so recently as in the reign of the Third King George, in respect of her criminal code and her prison regulations, one of the most bloody-minded and barbarous countries on the earth If I thought it would do any good to the rising generation, I would cheerfully give my consent to the disinterment of the bones of any genteel highwayman (the more genteel, the more cheerfully), and to their exposure, piecemeal, on any signpost, gate, or gibbet that might be deemed a good elevation for the purpose My reason is as well convinced that these gentry were utterly worthless and debauched villains, as it is that the laws and jails hardened them in their evil courses, or that their wonderful escapes were effected by the prison-turnkeys who, in those admirable days, had always been felons themselves, and were, to the last, their bosom friends and pot companions At the same time I know, as all men do or should, that the subject of Prison Discipline is one of the highest importance to any community, and that in her sweeping reform and bright example to other countries on this head. America has shown great wisdom, great benevolence, and exalted policy In contrasting her system with that which we have modelled upon it. I merely seek to show that with all its drawbacks, ours has some advantages of its own *

The House of Correction which has led to these remarks is not walled, like other prisons, but is palisaded round about with tall rough stakes, something after the manner of an

^{*} Apart from profit made by the useful labour of prisoners which we can never hope to realize to any great extent, and which it is perhaps not expedient for us to try to gain, there are two prisons in London in all respects equal, and in some decidedly superior, to any I saw or have ever heard or read of in America One is the Tothill Fields Bridewell, conducted by Lieutenant A. F. Tracey, R. N., the other the Middlesex House of Correction, superintended by Mr. Chesterton. This gentle man also holds an appointment in the Public Service. Both are en lightened and superior men, and it would be as difficult to find persons better qualified for the functions they discharge with firmness, zeal, intelligence, and humanity, as it would be to exceed the perfect order and arrangement of the institutions they govern enclosure for keeping elephants in, as we see it represented in Eastern prints and pictures. The prisoners wear a particular dress, and those who are sentenced to hard labour work at nail-making or stone-cutting. When I was there, the latter class of labourers were employed upon the stone for a new custom-house in course of erection at Boston. They appeared to shape it skilfully and with expedition, though there were very few among them (if any) who had not acquired the art within the prison gates.

The women, all in one large room, were employed in making light clothing for New Orleans and the Southern States. They did their work in silence like the men, and like them were overlooked by the person contracting for their labour, or by some agent of his appointment. In addition to this, they are every moment liable to be visited by the prison officers appointed for that purpose

The arrangements for cooking, washing of clothes, and so forth, are much upon the plan of those I have seen at home Their mode of bestowing the prisoners at night (which is of general adoption) differs from ours, and is both simple and effective In the centre of a lofty area, lighted by windows in the four walls, are five tiers of cells, one above the other, each tier having before it a light iron gallery, attainable by stairs of the same construction and material, excepting the lower one, which is on the ground Behind these, back to back with them and facing the opposite wall, are five corresponding rows of cells, accessible by similar means, so that, supposing the prisoners locked up in their cells, an officer stationed on the ground, with his back to the wall, has half their number under his eye at once, the remaining half being equally under the observation of another officer on the opposite side—and all in one great apartment Unless this watch be corrupted or sleeping on his post, it is impossible for a man to escape, for even in the event of his forcing the iron door of his cell without noise (which is exceedingly improbable), the moment he appears outside and steps into that one of the five galleries on which it is situated, he must be plainly and fully visible to the officer below Each of these cells holds a small truckle-bed, in which one prisoner sleeps, never more It is small, of course, and the door being not solid, but grated, and without blind or curtain, the prisoner within is at all times exposed to the observation and inspection of any guard who may pass along that tier at any hour or minute of the night. Every day the prisoners receive their dinner, singly, through a trap in the kitchen wall, and each man carries his to his sleeping-cell to eat it, where he is locked up alone for that purpose one hour. The whole of this arrangement struck me as being admirable, and I hope that the next new prison we erect in England may be built on this plan.

I was given to understand that in this prison no swords or firearms, or even cudgels, are kept, nor is it probable that, so long as its present excellent management continues, any weapon, offensive or defensive, will ever be required within its bounds

Such are the Institutions at South Boston! In all of them the unfortunate or degenerate citizens of the state are carefully instructed in their duties both to God and man, are surrounded by all reasonable means of comfort and happiness that their condition will admit of, are appealed to, as members of the great human family, however afflicted, indigent, or fallen, are ruled by the strong heart, and not by the strong (though immeasurably weaker) hand. I have described them at some length—firstly, because their worth demanded it, and secondly, because I mean to take them for a model, and to content myself with saying of others we may come to, whose design and purpose are the same, that in this or that respect they practically fail, or differ

I wish by this account of them, imperfect in its execution, but, in its just intention, honest, I could hope to convey to my readers one-hundredth part of the gratification the sights

I have described afforded me

To an Englishman, accustomed to the paraphernalia of Westminster Hall, an American Court of Law is as odd a sight as, I suppose, an English Court of Law would be to an American Except in the Supreme Court at Washington, where the judges wear a plain black robe, there is no such thing as a wig or gown connected with the administration of justice The gentlemen of the bar being barristers and attorneys too (for there is no division of those functions as in England), are no more removed from their clients than attorneys in our Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors are from theirs. The jury are quite at home, and make themselves as comfortable as circumstances will permit. The witness is so little elevated above, or put aloof from, the crowd in the court, that a stranger entering during a pause in the proceedings would find it difficult to pick him out from the rest. And if it chanced to be a criminal trial, his eyes, in nine cases out of ten, would wander to the dock in search of the prisoner in vain, for that gentleman would most likely be lounging among the most distinguished ornaments of the legal profession, whispering suggestions in his counsel's ear, or making a toothpick out of an old quill with his penknife

I could not but notice these differences when I visited the courts at Boston I was much surprised at first, too, to observe that the counsel who interrogated the witness under examination at the time did so sitting But seeing that he was also occupied in writing down the answers, and remembering that he was alone and had no "jumor," I quickly consoled myself with the reflection that law was not quite so expensive an aiticle here as at home, and that the absence of sundry formalities which we regard as indispensable, had doubtless a very favourable influence upon the bill of costs

In every Court ample and commodious provision is made for the accommodation of the citizens. This is the case all through America. In every public institution the right of the people to attend, and to have an interest in the proceedings, is most fully and distinctly recognized. There are no grim doorkeepers to dole out their tardy civility by the sixpenny-worth, nor is there, I sincerely believe, any insolence of office of any kind. Nothing national is exhibited for money, and no public officer is a showman. We have begun of late years to imitate this good example. I hope we shall continue to do so, and that in the fullness of time even deans and chapters may be converted.

even deans and chapters may be converted

In the Civil Court an action was trying for damages sustained in some accident upon a railway The witnesses had been examined, and counsel was addressing the jury The learned gentieman, like a few of his English brethren, was desperately long-winded, and had a remarkable capacity of saying the same thing over and over again. His great theme was "Warren the engine driver," whom he pressed into the service of every sentence he uttered. I listened to him for about a quarter of an hour, and, coming out of court at the expiration of that time without the faintest ray of enlightenment as to the ments of the case, felt as if I were at home again.

In the prisoners' cell, waiting to be examined by the magistrate on a charge of theft, was a boy. This lad, instead of being committed to a common jail, would be sent to the asylum at South Boston, and there taught a trade, and in the course of time he would be bound apprentice to some respectable master. Thus his detection in this offence, instead of being the prelude to a life of infamy and a miserable death, would lead, there was a reasonable hope, to his being reclaimed from vice, and becoming a worthy member

I am by no means a wholesale admirer of our legal solemnities, many of which impress me as being exceedingly ludicrous Strange as it may seem, too, there is undoubtedly a degree of protection in the wig and gown-a dismissal of individual responsibility in dressing for the part -which encourages that insolent bearing and language, and that gross perversion of the office of a pleader for The Truth, so frequent in our courts of law Still, I cannot help doubting whether America, in her desire to shake off the absurdities and abuses of the old system, may not have gone too far into the opposite extreme, and whether it is not desirable, especially in the small community of a city like this, where each man knows the other, to surround the administration of justice with some artificial barriers against the "Hail fellow, well met" deportment of everyday life All the aid it can have in the very high character and ability of the Bench, not only here but elsewhere, it has, and well deserves to have, but it may need something more—not to impress the thoughtful and the well informed, but the ignorant and heedless, a class which includes some prisoners and many witnesses. These institutions were established, no doubt, upon the principle that those who had so large a share in making the laws would certainly respect them But experience has proved this hope to be fallacious, for no men know better than the Judges of America, that on the occasion of any great popular excitement the law is powerless, and cannot for the time assert its own supremacy

The tone of society in Boston is one of perfect politeness, courtesy, and good breeding The ladies are unquestionably very beautiful-in face, but there I am compelled to stop Their education is much as with us-neither better nor I had heard some very marvellous stories in this respect, but not believing them, was not disappointed Blue ladies there are in Boston, but, like philosophers of that colour and sex in most other latitudes, they rather desire to be thought superior than to be so Evangelical ladies there are likewise, whose attachment to the forms of religion and horror of theatrical entertainments are most exemplary Ladies who have a passion for attending lectures are to be found among all classes and all conditions In the kind of provincial life which prevails in cities such as this, the Pulpit has great influence. The peculiar province of the Pulpit in New England (always excepting the Unitarian ministry) would appear to be the denouncement of all innocent and rational amusements The church, the chapel, and the lecture room are the only means of excitement excepted, and to the church, the chapel, and the lecture-room the ladies resort in crowds

Wherever religion is resorted to as a strong drink, and as an escape from the dull monotonous round of home, those of its ministers who pepper the highest will be the surest to please. They who strew the Eternal Path with the greatest amount of brimstone, and who most ruthlessly tread down the flowers and leaves that grow by the wayside, will be voted the most righteous, and they who enlarge with the greatest pertinacity on the difficulty of getting into heaven will be considered by all true believers certain of going there though it would be hard to say by what process of reasoning this conclusion is arrived at. It is so at home, and it is so abroad. With regard to the other means of excitement, the Lecture, at has at least the ment of being always new. One lecture treads so quickly on the heels of another that none are remembered, and the course of this month may be safely repeated next, with its charm of novelty unbroken and its interest unabated

The fruits of the earth have their growth in corruption Out of the rottenness of these things there has sprung up in Boston a sect of philosophers known as Transcendentalists On inquiring what this appellation might be supposed to signify, I was given to understand that whatever was unintelligible would be certainly transcendental. Not deriving much comfort from this elucidation, I pursued the inquiry still further, and found that the Transcendentalists are followers of my friend Mr Carlyle-or I should rather say, of a follower of his, Mr Ralph Waldo Emerson This gentleman has written a volume of Essays, in which, among much that is dreamy and fanciful (if he will pardon me for saying so), there is much more that is true and manly, honest and bold Transcendentalism has its occasional vagaries (what school has not?), but it has good healthful qualities in spite of them, not least among the number a hearty disgust of Cant, and an aptitude to detect her in all the million varieties of her everlasting wardrobe And, therefore, if I were a Bostonian, I think I would be a Transcendentalist

The only preacher I heard in Boston was Mr Taylor, who addresses himself peculiarly to seamen, and who was once a mariner himself I found his chapel down among the shipping, in one of the narrow old waterside streets, with a gay blue flag waving freely from its roof In the gallery opposite to the pulpit were a little choir of male and female singers, a violoncello, and a violin The preacher already sat in the pulpit, which was raised on pillars, and ornamented behind him with painted drapery of a lively and somewhat theatrical appearance He looked a weatherbeaten, hard-featured man of about six or eight and fifty, with deep lines graven, as it were, into his face, dark hair, and a stern, keen eye Yet the general character of his countenance was pleasant and agreeable The service commenced with a hymn, to which succeeded an extemporary prayer It had the fault of frequent repetition, incidental to all such prayers, but it was plain and comprehensive in its doctrines, and breathed a tone of general sympathy and charity, which is not so commonly a characteristic of this form of address to the Deity as it might be. That done, he opened his discourse, taking for his text a passage from the Song of Solomon, laid upon the desk before the commencement of the service by some unknown member of the congregation "Who is this coming up from the wilderness, leaning on the arm of her beloved?"

He handled his text in all kinds of ways, and twisted it into all manner of shapes, but always ingeniously, and with a rude eloquence well adapted to the comprehension of his hearers Indeed, if I be not mistaken, he studied their sympathies and understandings much more than the display of his own powers His imagery was all drawn from the sea. and from the incidents of a seaman's life, and was often remarkably good He spoke to them of "that glorious man. Lord Nelson," and of Collingwood, and drew nothing in, as the saving is, by the head and shoulders, but brought it to bear upon his purpose naturally, and with a sharp mind to its effect Sometimes, when much excited with his subject. he had an odd way-compounded of John Bunyan and Balfour of Burley-of taking his great quarto Bible under his arm and pacing up and down the pulpit with it, looking steadily down, meantime, into the midst of the congregation Thus, when he applied his text to the first assemblage of his hearers, and pictured the wonder of the church at their presumption in forming a congregation among themselves, he stopped short with his Bible under his arm in the manner I have described, and pursued his discourse after this manner -

"Who are these—who are they—who are these fellows? where do they come from? Where are they going to?—Come from! What's the answer?"—leaning out of the pulpit, and pointing downward with his right hand "From below!"—starting back again, and looking at the sailors before him "From below, my brethren From under the hatches of sin, battened down above you by the evil one That's where you came from!"—a walk up and down the pulpit. "And where are you going?"—stopping abruptly "where are you going? Aloft!"—very softly, and pointing upward "aloft!"—louder "aloft!"—louder still "that's where you are going-with a fair wind-all taut and trim. steering direct for Heaven in its glory, where there are no storms or foul weather, and where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest"-Another walk "That's where you're going to, my friends That's it That's the place That's the port That's the haven It's a blessed harbour-still water there, in all changes of the winds and tides, no driving ashore upon the rocks, or slip ping your cables and running out to sea, there Peacepeace—peace—all peace!"—Another walk, and patting the Bible under his left arm "What! These fellows are coming from the wilderness, are they? Yes From the drearv. blighted wilderness of Iniquity, whose only crop is Death But do they lean upon anything—do they lean upon nothing, these poor seamen?"—Three raps upon the Bible "Oh, yes -Yes -They lean upon the arm of their Beloved"three more raps "upon the arm of their Beloved"—three more, and a walk "Pılot, guiding-star, and compass, all in one, to all hands—here it is "—three more They can do their seaman's duty manfully, and be easy in their minds in the utmost peril and danger, with this "-two more "They can come, even these poor fellows can come, from the wilderness leaning on the arm of their Beloved, and go up-up-up "-raising his hand higher, and higher, at every repetition of the word, so that he stood with it at last stretched above his head, regarding them in a strange, rapt manner, and pressing the book triumphantly to his breast, until he gradually subsided into some other portion of his discourse

I have cited this rather as an instance of the preacher's eccentricities than his merits, though, taken in connection with his look and manner, and the character of his audience, even this was striking. It is possible, however, that my favourable impression of him may have been greatly influenced and strengthened, firstly, by his impressing upon his hearers that the true observance of religion was not inconsistent with a cheerful deportment and an exact discharge of the duties of their station, which, indeed, it scrupulously required of them, and secondly, by his cautioning them not to set up any monopoly in Paradise and its mercies I never heard these two points so wisely touched (if indeed I have ever heard them touched at all) by any preacher of that kind before

Having passed the time I spent in Boston in making myself acquainted with these things, in settling the course I should take in my future travels, and in mixing constantly with its society, I am not aware that I have any occasion to prolong this chapter—Such of its social customs as I have not mentioned, however, may be told in a very few words

The usual dinner-hour is two o'clock. A dinner-party takes place at five, and at an evening party they seldom sup later than eleven, so that it goes hard but one gets home, even from a rout, by midnight. I never could find out any difference between a party at Boston and a party in London, saving that at the former place all assemblies are held at more rational hours, that the conversation may possibly be a little louder and more cheerful, that a guest is usually expected to ascend to the very top of the house to take his cloak off, that he is certain to see at every dinner an unusual amount of poultry on the table, and at every supper at least two mighty bowls of hot stewed oysters, in any one of which a half-grown Duke of Clarence might be smothered easily

There are two theatres in Boston, of good size and construction, but sadly in want of patronage. The few ladies who resort to them sit, as of right, in the front rows of the boxes

The bar is a large room with a stone floor, and there people stand and smoke and lounge about all the evening, dropping in and out as the humour takes them. There, too, the stranger is initiated into the mysteries of Gin-sling, Cocktail, Sangaree, Mint Julep, Sherry-cobbler, Timber Doodle, and other rare drinks. The house is full of boarders, both married and single, many of whom sleep upon the premises, and contract by the week for their board and lodging—the charge for which diminishes as they go nearer the sky to roost A public table is laid in a very handsome hall for breakfast, and for dinner, and for supper. The party sitting down together to these meals will vary in number from one to two hundred—sometimes more. The advent of each of these epochs in the day is proclaimed by an awful gong, which shakes the very window-frames as it reverberates through the house, and horribly disturbs nervous foreigners. There is an ordinary for ladies, and an ordinary for gentlemen

In our private room the cloth could not, for any earthly consideration, have been laid for dinner without a huge glass dish of cranberries in the middle of the table, and breakfast would have been no breakfast unless the principal dish were a deformed beef-steak with a great flat bone in the centre, swimming in hot butter, and sprinkled with the very blackest of all possible pepper. Our bedroom was spacious and airy, but (like every bedroom on this side of the Atlantic) very bare of furniture, having no curtains to the French bedstead or to the window. It had one unusual luxury, however, in the shape of a wardrobe of painted wood, something smaller than an English watchbox, or if this comparison should be insufficient to convey a just idea of its dimensions, they may be estimated from the fact of my having lived for fourteen days and nights in the firm belief that it was a shower-bath

AN AMERICAN RAILROAD LOWELL AND ITS FACTORY SYSTEM

BEFORE leaving Boston, I devoted one day to an excursion to Lowell I assign a separate chapter to this visit, not because I am about to describe it at any great length, but because I remember it as a thing by itself, and am desirous that my readers should do the same.

I made acquaintance with an American railroad on this occasion for the first time. As these works are pretty much alike all through the States, their general characteristics are easily described.

There are no first and second class carriages, as with us, but there is a gentlemen's car and a ladies' car—the main distinction between which is that in the first everybody smokes, and in the second nobody does. As a black man never travels with a white one, there is also a negro car, which is a great blundering clumsy chest, such as Gulliver put to sea in from the kingdom of Brobdingnag. There is a great deal of jolting, a great deal of noise, a great deal of wall, not much window, a locomotive engine, a shriek, and a bell

The cars are like shabby omnibuses, but larger—holding thirty, forty, fifty people. The seats, instead of stretching from end to end, are placed crosswise. Each seat holds two persons. There is a long row of them on each side of the caravan, a narrow passage up the middle, and a door at both ends. In the centre of the carriage there is usually a stove, fed with charcoal or anthracite coal, which is for the most part red-hot. It is insufferably close, and you see the hot air fluttering between yourself and any other object you may happen to look at, like the ghost of smoke

In the ladies' car there are a great many gentlemen who There are also a great many ladies have ladies with them who have nobody with them, for any lady may travel alone from one end of the United States to the other, and be certain of the most courteous and considerate treatment everywhere The conductor or check-taker, or guard, or whatever he may be, wears no uniform He walks up and down the car. and in and out of it, as his fancy dictates, leans against the door with his hands in his pockets and stares at you, if you chance to be a stranger, or enters into conversation with the passengers about him A great many newspapers are pulled out, and a few of them are read Everybody talks to you, or to anybody else who hits his fancy If you are an Englishman, he expects that that railroad is pretty much like an English railroad If you say "No," he says "Yes?" (interrogatively), and asks in what respect they differ You enumerate the heads of difference, one by one, and he says "Yes?" (still interrogatively) to each Then he guesses that you don't travel faster in England, and on your replying that you do, says "Yes?" again (still interrogatively), and, it is quite evident, don't believe it After a long pause he remarks, partly to you, and partly to the knob on the top of his stick, that "Yankees are reckoned to be considerable of a go-ahead people too," upon which you say "Yes," and then he says "Yes" again (affirmatively this time), and upon your looking out of window, tells you that behind that hill, and some three miles from the next station, there is a clever town in a smart lo ca-tion, where he expects you have con-cluded to stop. Your answer in the negative naturally leads to more questions in reference to your intended route (always pronounced rout), and wherever you are going, you invariably learn that you can't get there without immense difficulty and danger, and that all the great sights are some where else

If a lady take a fancy to any male passenger's seat, the gentleman who accompanies her gives him notice of the fact, and he immediately vacates it with great politeness. Politics are much discussed, so are banks, so is cotton. Quiet people avoid the question of the Presidency, for there will be a new election in three years and a half, and party feeling runs very high the great constitutional feature of this institution being, that directly the acrimony of the last election is over, the acrimony of the next one begins, which is an unspeakable comfort to all strong politicians and true lovers of their country—that is to say, to ninety nine men and boys out of every ninety-nine and a quarter

Except when a branch road joins the main one, there is seldom more than one track of rails, so that the road is very narrow, and the view, where there is a deep cutting, by no means extensive When there is not, the character of the scenery is always the same—mile after mile of stunted trees. some hewn down by the axe, some blown down by the wind, some half fallen and resting on their neighbours, many mere logs half hidden in the swamp, others mouldered away to spongy chips The very soil of the earth is made up of minute fragments such as these, each pool of stagmant water has its crust of vegetable rottenness, on every side there are the boughs, and trunks, and stumps of trees, in every possible stage of decay, decomposition, and neglect. Now you emerge for a few brief minutes on an open country, glittering with some bright lake or pool, broad as many an English river, but so small here that it scarcely has a name, now catch hasty glimpses of a distant town, with its clean white houses and their cool piazzas, its prim New England church and schoolhouse, when whir-r-r-r almost before you have seen them, comes the same dark screen the stunted trees, the stumps, the logs, the stagnant water—all so like the last that you seem to have been transported back again by magic

The train calls at stations in the woods, where the wild impossibility of anybody having the smallest reason to get out is only to be equalled by the apparently desperate hopelessness of there being anybody to get in It rushes across the turnpike road, where there is no gate, no policeman, no signal, nothing but a rough wooden arch, on which is painted "When the Bell rings, look out for the Locomotive" On it whirls headlong, dives through the woods again, emerges in the light, clatters over frail arches, rumbles upon the heavy ground, shoots beneath a wooden bridge which intercepts the light for a second like a wink, suddenly awakens all the slumbering echoes in the main street of a large town, and dashes on haphazard, pell-mell, neck or nothing, down the middle of the road There—with mechanics working at their trades, and people leaning from their doors and windows, and boys flying kites and playing marbles, and men smoking, and women talking, and children crawling, and pigs burrowing. and unaccustomed horses plunging and rearing, close to the very rails-there-on, on, on-tears the mad dragon of an engine with its train of cars, scattering in all directions a shower of burning sparks from its wood fire, screeching, hissing, yelling, panting, until at last the thirsty monster stops beneath a covered way to drink, the people cluster round, and you have time to breathe again

I was met at the station at Lowell by a gentleman intimately connected with the management of the factories there, and gladly putting myself under his guidance, drove off at once to that quarter of the town in which the works, the object of my visit, were situated. Although only just of age—for, if my recollection serve me, it has been a manufacturing town barely one-and twenty years—Lowell is a large, populous, thriving place. Those indications of its youth which first attract the eye, give it a quaintness and oddity of character which, to a visitor from the old country, is amusing enough. It was a very dirty winter's day, and nothing in the whole town looked old to me, except the mud, which in some parts was almost knee-deep, and might have been deposited there on the subsiding of the waters after the Deluge In one place there was a new wooden church, which, having no steeple, and being vet unpainted looked like an enormous packing-case without any direction upon it In another there was a large hotel, whose walls and colonnades were so crisp, and thin, and slight, that it had exactly the appearance of being built with cards I was careful not to draw my breath as we passed, and trembled when I saw a workman come out upon the roof, lest with one thoughtless stamp of his foot he should crush the structure beneath him, and bring it rattling down The very river that moves the machinery in the mills (for they are all worked by water-power) seems to acquire a new character from the fresh buildings of bright red brick and painted wood among which it takes its course, and to be as light-headed, thoughtless, and brisk a young river, in its murmurings and tumblings, as one would desire to see One would swear that every "Bakery," "Grocery," and "Bookbindery," and other kind of store, took its shutters down for the first time, and started in business yesterday The golden pestles and mortars fixed as signs upon the sun-blind frames outside the druggists' appear to have been just turned out of the United States Mint, and when I saw a baby of some week or ten days old in a woman's arms at a street corner, I found myself unconsciously wondering where it came from, never supposing for an instant that it could have been born in such a young town as that

There are several factories in Lowell, each of which belongs to what we should term a Company of Proprietors, but what they call in America a Corporation I went over several of these, such as a woollen factory, a carpet factory, and a cotton factory, examined them in every part, and saw them in their ordinary working aspect, with no preparation of any kind, or departure from their ordinary everyday proceedings I may add that I am well acquainted with our manufacturing towns in England, and have visited many mills in Manchester and elsewhere in the same manner

I happened to arrive at the first factory just as the dinner hour was over, and the girls were returning to their work—indeed the stairs of the mill were thronged with them as I ascended They were all well dressed, but not to my thinking above their condition, for I like to see the humbler classes of society careful of their dress and appearance, and even, if they please, decorated with such little trinkets as come within the compass of their means. Supposing it confined within reasonable limits, I would always encourage this kind of pride, as a worthy element of self-respect, in any person I employed, and should no more be deterred from doing so, because some wretched female referred her fall to a love of dress, than I would allow my construction of the real intent and meaning of the Sabbath to be influenced by any warning to the well-disposed, founded on his backslidings on that particular day, which might emanate from the rather doubtful authority of a murderer in Newgate

These girls, as I have said, were all well dressed, and that phrase necessarily includes extreme cleanliness. They had serviceable bonnets, good warm cloaks and shawls, and were not above clogs and pattens. Moreover, there were places in the mill in which they could deposit these things without injury, and there were conveniences for washing. They were healthy in appearance, many of them remarkably so, and had the manners and deportment of young women, not of degraded brutes of burden. If I had seen in one of those mills (but I did not, though I looked for something of this kind with a sharp eye) the most lisping, mincing, affected, and ridiculous young creature that my imagination could suggest, I should have thought of the careless, moping, slatternly, degraded, dull reverse (I have seen that), and should have been still well pleased to look upon her

The rooms in which they worked were as well ordered as themselves. In the windows of some there were green plants, which were trained to shade the glass, in all, there was as much fresh air, cleanliness, and comfort, as the nature of the occupation would possibly admit of Out of so large a number of females, many of whom were only then just verging upon womanhood, it may be reasonably supposed that some were delicate and fragile in appearance no doubt there were. But I solemnly declare, that from all the crowd I saw in the different factories that day, I cannot recall or separate one young face that gave me a painful impression—not one young girl whom, assuming it to be matter of necessity that she should gain her daily bread by the labour of her hands, I would have removed from those works if I had had the power

They reside in various boarding-houses near at hand. The owners of the mills are particularly careful to allow no persons to enter upon the possession of these houses whose characters have not undergone the most searching and thorough inquiry. Any complaint that is made against them, by the boarders, or by any one else, is fully investigated, and if good ground of complaint be shown to exist against them, they are removed, and their occupation is handed over to some more deserving person. There are a few children employed in these factories, but not many. The laws of the State forbid their working more than nine months in the year, and require that they be educated during the other three. For this purpose there are schools in Lowell, and there are churches and chapels of various persuasions, in which they been educated.

At some distance from the factories, and on the highest and pleasantest ground in the neighbourhood, stands their hospital, or boarding house for the sick it is the best house in those parts, and was built by an eminent merchant for his Like that institution at Boston which I have own residence before described, it is not parcelled out into wards, but is divided into convenient chambers, each of which has all the comforts of a very comfortable home The principal medical attendant resides under the same roof, and were the patients members of his own family, they could not be better cared for, or attended with greater gentleness and consideration. The weekly charge in this establishment for each female patient is three dollars, or twelve shillings English, but no girl employed by any of the corporations is ever excluded for want of the means of payment. That they do not very often want the means, may be gathered from the fact that in July, 1841, no fewer than nine hundred and seventy-eight of these girls were depositors in the Lowell Savings Bank, the amount of whose joint savings was estimated at one hundred thousand dollars, or twenty thousand English pounds

I am now going to state three facts, which will startle a large class of readers on this side of the Atlantic very much.

Firstly, there is a joint-stock piano in a great many of the boarding-houses. Secondly, nearly all these young ladies subscribe to circulating libraries. Thirdly, they have got up among themselves a periodical called The Lowell Offering, "A repository of original articles, written exclusively by females actively employed in the mills,"—which is duly printed, published, and sold, and whereof I brought away from Lowell four hundred good solid pages, which I have read from beginning to end

The large class of readers startled by these facts will exclaim with one voice, "How very preposterous!" On my deferentially inquiring why, they will answer, "These things are above their station" In reply to that objection, I would beg to ask what their station is

It is their station to work. And they do work. They labour in these mills, upon an average, twelve hours a day, which is unquestionably work, and pretty tight work too Perhaps it is above their station to indulge in such amusements, on any terms. Are we quite sure that we in England have not formed our ideas of the "station" of working people, from accustoming ourselves to the contemplation of that class as they are, and not as they might be? I think that if we examine our own feelings, we shall find that the pianos, and the circulating libraries, and even The Lowell Offering, startle us by their novelty, and not by their bearing upon any abstract question of right or wrong

For myself, I know no station in which, the occupation of to-day cheerfully done, and the occupation of to morrow cheerfully looked to, any one of these pursuits is not most humanizing and laudable. I know no station which is rendered more endurable to the person in it, or more safe to the person out of it, by having ignorance for its associate I know no station which has a right to monopolize the means of mutual instruction, improvement, and rational entertainment, or which has ever continued to be a station very long,

Of the merits of The Lowell Offering as a literary production, I will only observe, putting entirely out of sight the fact of the articles having been written by these girls after the arduous labours of the day, that it will compare advantageously with a great many English Annuals It is pleasant to find that many of its Tales are of the Mills and of those who work in them, that they inculcate habits of self-denial and contentment, and teach good doctrines of enlarged benevo-A strong feeling for the beauties of nature, as displayed in the solitudes the writers have left at home, breathes through its pages like wholesome village air, and though a circulating library is a favourable school for the study of such topics, it has very scant allusion to fine clothes, fine marriages, fine houses, or fine life Some persons might object to the papers being signed occasionally with rather fine names, but this is an American fashion. One of the provinces of the state legislature of Massachusetts is to alter ugly names into pretty ones, as the children improve upon the tastes of their These changes costing little or nothing, scores of parents Mary Anns are solemnly converted into Bevelinas every session

It is said that on the occasion of a visit from General Jackson or General Harrison to this town (I forget which, but it is not to the purpose), he walked through three miles and a half of these young ladies all dressed out with parasols and silk stockings. But as I am not aware that any worse consequence ensued than a sudden looking-up of all the parasols and silk stockings in the market, and perhaps the bankruptcy of some speculative New Englander who bought them all up at any price, in expectation of a demand that never came, I set no great store by the circumstance

In this brief account of Lowell, and inadequate expression of the gratification it yielded me, and cannot fail to afford to any foreigner to whom the condition of such people at home is a subject of interest and anxious speculation, I have carefully abstained from drawing a comparison between these factories and those of our own land. Many of the circumstances whose strong influence has been at work for years in our manufacturing towns have not arisen here, and there is no manufacturing population in Lowell, so to speak for these girls (often the daughters of small farmers) come from other States, remain a few years in the mills, and then go home for good

The contrast would be a strong one, for it would be between the Good and Evil, the living light and deepest shadow I abstain from it, because I deem it just to do so But I only the more earnestly adjure all those whose eyes may rest on these pages, to pause and reflect upon the difference between this town and those great haunts of desperate misery, to call to mind, if they can in the midst of party strife and squabble, the efforts that must be made to purge them of their suffering and danger, and last and foremost, to remember how the precious Time is rushing by

I returned at night by the same railroad and in the same kind of car. One of the passengers being exceedingly anxious to expound at great length to my companion (not to me, of course) the true principles on which books of travel in America should be written by Englishmen, I feigned to fall asleep. But glancing all the way out at window from the corners of my eyes, I found abundance of entertainment for the rest of the ride in watching the effects of the wood fire, which had been invisible in the morning, but were now brought out in full relief by the darkness for we were travelling in a whirlwind of bright sparks, which showered about us like a storm of fiery snow

WORCESTER THE CONNECTICUT RIVER HARTFORD NEW HAVEN TO NEW YORK

Leaving Boston on the afternoon of Saturday the fifth of February, we proceeded by another railroad to Worcester, a pretty New England town, where we had arranged to remain under the hospitable roof of the Governor of the State until

Monday morning

These towns and cities of New England (many of which would be villages in Old England) are as favourable specimens of rural America, as their people are of rural Americans. The well-trimmed lawns and green meadows of home are not there, and the grass, compared with our ornamental plots and pastures, is rank, and rough, and wild; but delicate slopes of land, gently swelling hills, wooded valleys, and slender streams, abound. Every little colony of houses has its church and schoolhouse peeping from among the white roofs and shady trees, every house is the whitest of the white, every Venetian blind the greenest of the green, every fine day's sky the bluest of the blue A sharp dry wind and a slight frost had so hardened the roads when we alighted at Worcester, that their furrowed tracks were like ridges of granite. There was the usual aspect of newness on every object, of course the buildings looked as if they had been built and painted that morning, and could be taken down on Monday with very little trouble In the keen evening air every sharp outline looked a hundred times sharper than ever The clean cardboard colonnades had no more perspective than a Chinese bridge on a teacup, and appeared equally well calculated for The razorlike edges of the detached cottages seemed to cut the very wind as it whistled against them, and to send it smarting on its way with a shriller cry than before slightly-built wooden dwellings behind which the sun was setting with a brilliant lustre, could be so looked through and through, that the idea of any inhabitant being able to hide himself from the public gaze, or to have any secrets from the public eye, was not entertainable for a moment Even where a blazing fire shone through the uncurtained windows of some distant house, it had the air of being newly lighted, and of lacking warmth, and instead of awakening thoughts of a snug chamber, bright with faces that first saw the light round that same hearth, and ruddy with warm hangings, it came upon one suggestive of the smell of new mortar and damp walls

So I thought, at least, that evening Next morning when the sun was shining brightly, and the clear church bells were ringing, and sedate people in their best clothes enlivened the pathway near at hand and dotted the distant thread of road, there was a pleasant Sabbath peacefulness on everything, which it was good to feel It would have been the better for an old church, better still for some old graves, but as it was, a wholesome repose and tranquility pervaded the scene, which, after the restless ocean and the hurried city, had a doubly grateful influence on the spirits

We went on next morning, still by railroad, to Springfield From that place to Hartford, whither we were bound, is a distance of only five-and-twenty miles, but at that time of the year the roads were so bad that the journey would probably have occupied ten or twelve hours Fortunately, however, the winter having been unusually mild, the Connecticut River was "open," or, in other words, not frozen The captam of a small steamboat was going to make his first trip for the season that day (the second February trip, I believe, within the memory of man), and only waited for us to go on board Accordingly, we went on board, with as little delay as might be. He was as good as his word, and started directly

It certainly was not called a small steamboat without reason. I omitted to ask the question, but I should think it must have been of about half a pony power. Mr Paap, the celebrated dwarf, might have lived and died happily in the cabin, which was fitted with common sash-windows like an ordinary dwelling-house. These windows had bright-red curtains, too, hung on slack strings across the lower panes, so that it looked like the parlour of a Lilliputian public-house, which had got affoat in a flood or some other water accident, and was drifting nobody knew where. But even in this chamber there was a rocking-chair. It would be impossible to get on anywhere, in America, without a rocking-chair.

I am afraid to tell how many feet short this vessel was, or how many feet narrow to apply the words length and width to such measurement would be a contradiction in terms But I may state that we all kept the middle of the deck, lest the boat should unexpectedly tip over, and that the machinery, by some surprising process of condensation, worked between it and the keel the whole forming a warm sandwich about three feet thick

It rained all day as I once thought it never did rain any where but in the Highlands of Scotland The river was full of floating blocks of ice, which were constantly crunching and cracking under us, and the depth of water in the course we took to avoid the larger masses, carried down the middle of the river by the current, did not exceed a few inches Nevertheless, we moved onward dexterously, and being well wrapped up, bade defiance to the weather, and emjoyed the journey The Connecticut River is a fine stream, and the banks in summer time are, I have no doubt, beautiful at all events I was told so by a young lady in the cabin, and she should be a judge of beauty, if the possession of a quality include the appreciation of it, for a more beautiful creature I never looked upon

After two hours and a half of this odd travelling (including a stoppage at a small town, where we were saluted by a gun considerably bigger than our own chimney), we reached Hartford, and straightway repaired to an extremely comfortable hotel—except, as usual, in the article of bedrooms, which, in almost every place we visited, were very conducive to early rising

We tarried here four days The town is beautifully situated in a basin of green hills, the soil is rich, well wooded, and carefully improved It is the seat of the local legis lature of Connecticut, which sage body enacted in bygone times the renowned code of "Blue Laws," in virtue whereof, among other enlightened provisions, any citizen who could be proved to have kissed his wife on Sunday was punishable, I believe, with the stocks Too much of the old Puritan spirit exists in these parts to the present hour, but its influence has not tended, that I know, to make the people less hard in their bargains or more equal in their dealings As I never heard of its working that effect anywhere else, I infer that it never will here Indeed, I am accustomed, with reference to great professions and severe faces, to judge of the goods of the other world pretty much as I judge of the goods of this, and whenever I see a dealer in such commodities with too great a display of them in his window, I doubt the quality of the article within

In Hartford stands the famous oak in which the charter of King Charles was hidden. It is now inclosed in a gentleman's garden. In the State House is the charter itself. I found the courts of law here just the same as at Boston, the public institutions almost as good. The Insane Asylum is admirably conducted, and so is the Institution for the Deaf

I very much questioned within myself, as I walked through the Insane Asylum, whether I should have known the attendants from the patients, but for the few words which passed between the former and the Doctor, in reference to the persons under their charge Of course, I limit this remark merely to their looks, for the conversation of the mad people was mad enough

There was one little prim old lady of very smiling and good-humoured appearance, who came sidling up to me from the end of a long passage, and, with a curtsy of inexpressible condescension, propounded this unaccountable inquiry,—

"Does Pontefract still flourish, sir, upon the soil of England?"

"He does, ma'am," I rejoined

"When you last saw him, sir, he was--"

"Well, ma'am," said I, "extremely well He begged me to present his compliments I never saw him looking better"

At this the old lady was very much delighted. After glancing at me for a moment, as if to be quite sure that I was serious in my respectful air, she sidled back some paces, sidled forward again, made a sudden skip (at which I precipitately retreated a step or two), and said,—

"I am an antediluvian, sir"

I thought the best thing to say was, that I had suspected as much from the first Therefore I said so

"It is an extremely proud and pleasant thing, sir, to be an antediluvian," said the old lady

"I should think it was, ma'am," I rejoined

The old lady kissed her hand, gave another skip, smirked and sidled down the gallery in a most extraordinary manner, and ambled gracefully into her own bed-chamber

In another part of the building there was a male patient in bed, very much flushed and heated

"Well," said he, starting up, and pulling off his nightcap, "it's all settled at last I have arranged it with Queen Victoria"

"Arranged what?" asked the Doctor

"Why, that business," passing his hand wearily across his forehead, "about the siege of New York"

"Oh!" said I, like a man suddenly enlightened For he looked at me for an answer

"Yes Every house without a signal will be fired upon by the British troops No harm will be done to the others, no harm at all Those that want to be safe must hoist flags. That's all they'll have to do They must hoist flags." Even while he was speaking he seemed, I thought, to have some faint idea that his talk was incoherent. Directly he had said these words, he lay down again, gave a kind of a groan, and covered his hot head with the blankets

There was another, a young man, whose madness was love and music After playing on the accordion a march he had composed, he was very anxious that I should walk into his chamber, which I immediately did

By way of being very knowing, and humouring him to the top of his bent, I went to the window, which commanded a beautiful prospect, and remarked, with an address upon which I greatly plumed myself,—

"What a delicious country you have about these lodgings of yours"

"Poh!" said he, moving his fingers carelessly over the notes of his instrument "Well enough for such an Institution as this!"

I don't think I was ever so taken aback in all my life

"I come here just for a whim," he said coolly "That's all"

"Oh! that's all," said I

"Yes, that's all The Doctor's a smart man He quite enters into it It's a joke of mine I like it for a time You needn't mention it, but I think I shall go out next Tuesday 1"

I assured him that I would consider our interview perfectly confidential, and rejoined the Doctor As we were passing through a gallery on our way out, a well-dressed lady, of quiet and composed manners, came up, and proffering a slip of paper and a pen, begged that I would oblige her with an autograph I complied, and we parted

"I think I remember having had a few interviews like that with ladies out of doors I hope she is not mad?"

"Yes"

"On what subject? Autographs?"
"No She hears voices in the air"

"Well!" thought I, "it would be well if we could shut up a few false prophets of these later times, who have professed to do the same, and I should like to try the experiment on a Mormonist or two to begin with."

In this place there is the best jail for untiled offenders in the world. There is also a very well-ordered State prison, arranged upon the same plan as that at Boston, except that here there is always a sentry on the wall with a loaded gun. It contained at that time about two hundred prisoners. A spot was shown me in the sleeping ward where a watchman was murdered some years since in the dead of night, in a desperate attempt to escape made by a prisoner who had broken from his cell. A woman, too, was pointed out to me, who, for the murder of her husband, had been a close prisoner for sixteen years.

"Do you think," I asked of my conductor, "that after so very long an imprisonment, she has any thought or hope of ever regaining her liberty?"

"Oh dear, yes," he answered "To be sure she has"

"She has no chance of obtaining it, I suppose?"

"Well, I don't know,"—which, by-the-bye, is a national answer "Her friends mistrust her"

"What have they to do with it?" I naturally inquired

"Well, they won't petition"

"But if they did, they couldn't get her out, I suppose?"

"Well, not the first time, perhaps, nor yet the second, but tiring and wearying for a few years might do it"

"Does that ever do it?"

"Why, yes, that'll do it sometimes Political friends'll do it sometimes It's pretty often done, one way or another"

I shall always entertain a very pleasant and grateful recollection of Hartford It is a lovely place, and I had many friends there, whom I can never remember with indifference We left it with no little regret on the evening of Friday the 11th, and travelled that night by railroad to New Haven Upon the way the guard and I were formally introduced to each other (as we usually were on such occasions), and exchanged a variety of small talk. We reached New Haven at about eight o'clock, after a journey of three hours, and put up for the night at the best inn

New Haven, known also as the City of Elms, is a fine town Many of its streets (as its alias sufficiently imports) are planted with rows of grand old elm trees, and the same natural ornaments surround Yale College, an establishment of considerable eminence and reputation. The various de partments of this Institution are erected in a kind of park or common in the middle of the town, where they are dimly visible among the shadowing trees. The effect is very like that of an old cathedral yard in England, and when their branches are in full leaf, must be extremely picturesque. Even in the winter-time these groups of well-grown trees, clustering among the busy streets and houses of a thriving city, have a very quaint appearance, seeming to bring about a kind of compromise between town and country—as if each had met the other half-way, and shaken hands upon it—which is at once novel and pleasant.

After a night's rest, we rose early, and in good time went down to the wharf, and on board the packet New York for New York. This was the first American steamboat of any size that I had seen, and certainly to an English eye it was infinitely less like a steamboat than a huge floating bath. I could hardly persuade myself, indeed, but that the bathing establishment off Westminster Bridge, which I left a baby, had suddenly grown to an enormous size, run away from home, and set up in foreign parts as a steamer. Being in America, too, which our vagabonds do so particularly favour, it seemed the more probable

The great difference in appearance between these packets and ours is, that there is so much of them out of the water the main deck being enclosed on all sides, and filled with casks and goods, like any second or third floor in a stack of warehouses, and the promenade or hurricane-deck being a top of that again A part of the machinery is always above this deck, where the connecting-rod, in a strong and lofty frame, is seen working away like an iron top-sawyer There is seldom any mast or tackle-nothing aloft but two tall black chimneys The man at the helm is shut up in a little house in the fore part of the boat (the wheel being connected with the rudder by iron chains working the whole length of the deck), and the passengers, unless the weather be very fine indeed, usually congregate below Directly you have left the wharf, all the life, and stir, and bustle of a packet cease You wonder for a long time how she goes on, for there seems to be nobody in charge of her, and when another of these dull machines comes splashing by, you feel quite indignant with it, as a sullen, cumbrous, ungraceful, unshiplike leviathan, quite forgetting that the vessel you are on board of is its very counterpart

There is always a clerk's office on the lower deck, where you pay your fare, a ladies' cabin, baggage and stowage rooms, engineer's room, and, in short, a great variety of perplexities which render the discovery of the gentlemen's cabin a matter of some difficulty. It often occupies the whole length of the boat (as it did in this case), and has three or four tiers of berths on each side. When I first descended into the cabin of the New York, it looked, in my unaccustomed eyes, about as long as the Burlington Arcade.

The Sound, which has to be crossed on this passage, is not always a very safe or pleasant navigation, and has been the scene of some unfortunate accidents. It was a wet morning, and very misty, and we soon lost sight of land. The day was calm, however, and brightened towards noon. After exhausting (with good help from a friend) the larder, and the stock of bottled beer, I lay down to sleep, being very much tired with the fatigues of yesterday. But I awoke from my nap in time to hurry up and see Hell Gate, the Hog's Back, the Frying Pan, and other notorious localities, attractive to all readers of famous Diedrich Knickerbocker's History. We were now in a narrow channel, with sloping banks on either side, besprinkled with pleasant villas, and made refreshing to the sight by turf and trees. Soon we shot in quick succession past a lighthouse, a madhouse (how the lunatics flung up their caps and roared in sympathy with the headlong engine and the driving tide '), a jail, and other buildings, and so emerged into a noble bay, whose waters sparkled in the now cloudless sunshine like Nature's eyes turned up to heaven.

Then there lay stretched out before us, to the right, confused heaps of buildings, with here and there a spire or steeple looking down upon the herd below, and here and there, again, a cloud of lazy smoke, and in the foreground a forest of ships' masts, cheery with flapping sails and waving flags. Crossing from among them to the opposite shore were steam ferry-boats laden with people, coaches, horses, wagons, baskets, boxes, crossed and recrossed by other ferry-boats, all travelling to and fro, and never idle. Stately among these restless insects were two or three large ships, moving with slow majestic pace, as creatures of a prouder kind, disdainful of their puny journeys, and making for the broad sea Beyond were shining heights, and islands in the glancing river, and a distance scarcely less blue and bright than the sky it seemed to meet. The city's hum and buzz, the clinking of capstans, the ringing of bells, the barking of dogs, the clattering of wheels, tingled in the listening ear. All of which life and stir, coming across the stirring water, caught new life and animation from its free companionship, and, sympathizing with its buoyant spirits, glistened, as it seemed, in sport upon its surface, and hemmed the vessel round, and plashed the water high about her sides, and, floating her gallantly into the dock, flew off again to welcome other comers, and speed before them to the busy port

NEW YORK

The beautiful metropolis of America is by no means so clean a city as Boston, but many of its streets have the same characteristics—except that the houses are not quite so fresh-coloured, the signboards are not quite so gaudy, the gilded letters not quite so golden, the bricks not quite so red, the stone not quite so white, the blinds and area railings not quite so green, the knobs and plates upon the street doors not quite so bright and twinkling. There are many by-streets almost as neutral in clean colours, and positive in dirty ones, as by-streets in London, and there is one quarter, commonly called the Five Points, which, in respect of filth and wretchedness, may be safely backed against Seven Dials, or any other part of famed St. Giles's

The great promenade and thoroughfare, as most people know, is Broadway—a wide and bustling street, which, from the Battery Gardens to its opposite termination in a country road, may be four miles long Shall we six down in an upper floor of the Carlton House Hotel (situated in the best part of this main artery of New York), and when we are tired of looking down upon the life below, sally forth arm-in-arm, and mingle with the stream?

Warm weather! The sun strikes upon our heads at this open window, as though its rays were concentrated through a burning-glass, but the day is in its zenith, and the season Was there ever such a sunny street as this an unusual one Broadway! The pavement stones are polished with the tread of feet until they shine again, the red bricks of the houses might be yet in the dry, hot kilns, and the roofs of those omnibuses look as though, if water were poured on them, they would hiss and smoke, and smell like halfquenched fires No stint of omnibuses here! Half a dozen have gone by within as many minutes Plenty of hackney cabs and coaches too, gigs, phaetons, large-wheeled tilburies, and private carriages-rather of a clumsy make, and not very different from the public vehicles, but built for the heavy roads beyond the city pavement. Negro coachmen and white . in straw hats, black hats, white hats, glazed caps, fur caps. in coats of drab, black, brown, green, blue, nankeen, striped jean and linen, and there, in that one instance (look while it passes, or it will be too late), in suits of livery Southern republican that, who puts his blacks in uniform. and swells with Sultan pomp and power Yonder, where that phaeton with the well clipped pair of greys has stoppedstanding at their heads now-is a Yorkshire groom, who has not been very long in these parts, and looks sorrowfully round for a companion pair of top-boots, which he may traverse the city half a year without meeting Heaven save the ladies, how they dress! We have seen more colours in these ten minutes than we should have seen elsewhere in as many days What various parasols! what rainbow silks and satins! what pinking of thin stockings, and pinching of thin shoes, and fluttering of ribbons and silk tassels, and display of rich cloaks with gaudy hoods and linings! The young gentlemen are fond, you see, of turning down their shirtcollars and cultivating their whiskers, especially under the chin, but they cannot approach the ladies in their dress or bearing, being, to say the truth, humanity of quite another sort. Byrons of the desk and counter, pass on, and let us see what kind of men those are behind ye—those two la bourers in holiday clothes, of whom one carries in his hand a crumpled scrap of paper from which he tries to spell out a hard name, while the other looks about for it on all the doors and windows

Irishmen both! You might kno " them, if they were masked, by their long-tailed blue coats and bright buttons, and their drab trousers, which they wear like men well used to working dresses, who are easy in no others. It would be hard to keep your model republics going, without the countrymen and countrywomen of those two labourers. For who else would dig, and delve, and drudge, and do domestic work, and make canals and roads, and execute great lines of internal improvement? Irishmen both, and sorely puzzled, too, to find out what they seek. Let us go down and help them, for the love of home, and that spirit of liberty which admits of honest service to honest men, and honest work for honest bread, no matter what it be

That's well! We have got at the right address at last, though it is written in strange characters truly, and might have been scrawled with the blunt handle of the spade the writer better knows the use of, than a pen Their way hes yonder, but what business takes them there? They carry savings to hoard up? No They are brothers, those men. One crossed the sea alone, and working very hard for one half year, and living harder, saved funds enough to bring the other out. That done, they worked together side by side, contentedly sharing hard labour and hard living for another term, and then their sisters came, and then another brother, and lastly, their old mother And what now? Why, the poor old crone is restless in a strange land, and yearns to lay her bones, she says, among her people in the old graveyard at home, and so they go to pay her passage back And God help her and them, and every simple heart, and all who turn to the Jerusalem of their younger days, and have an altar fire upon the cold hearth of their fathers!

This narrow thoroughfare, baking and blistering in the sun, is Wall Street, the Stock Exchange and Lombard Street of New York Many a rapid fortune has been made in this street, and many a no less rapid ruin Some of these very merchants whom you see hanging about there now have locked up money in their strong-boxes, like the man in the Arabian Nights, and opening them again, have found but withered leaves Below, here by the water-side, where the bowsprits of ships stretch across the footway, and almost thrust themselves into the windows, he the noble American vessels which have made their Packet Service the finest in the world They have brought hither the foreigners who abound in all the streets not, perhaps, that there are more here than in other commercial cities, but elsewhere, they have particular haunts, and you must find them out-here, they pervade the town.

We must cross Broadway again, gaining some refreshment from the heat in the sight of the great blocks of clean ice which are being carried into shops and bar-rooms, and the pine-apples and water-melons profusely displayed for sale Fine streets of spacious houses here, you see-Wall Street has furnished and dismantled many of them very often-and here a deep green leafy square Be sure that is a hospitable house, with inmates to be affectionately remembered always, where they have the open door and pretty show of plants within, and where the child with laughing eyes is peeping out of window at the little dog below You wonder what may be the use of this tall flagstaff in the by-street, with something like Liberty's head-dress on its top, so do I But there is a passion for tall flagstaffs hereabout, and you may see its twin brother in five minutes, if you have a mind

Again across Broadway, and so—passing from the many-coloured crowd and glittering shops—into another long main street, the Bowery A railroad yonder, see, where two stout horses trot along, drawing a score or two of people and a great wooden ark with ease The stores are poorer here, the passengers less gay Clothes ready-made, and meat ready-cooked, are to be bought in these parts, and the lively whirl of carriages is exchanged for the deep rumble of carts and wagons These signs which are so plentiful, in shape like river buoys, or small balloons, hoisted by cords to poles, and dangling there, announce, as you may see by looking up, "Ovsters in every Style" They tempt the hungry most at night, for then dull candles glimmering inside illuminate these dainty words, and make the mouths of idlers water, as they read and linger

What is this dismal-fronted pile of bastard Egyptian, like an enchanter's palace in a melodrama? A famous prison, called The Tombs Shall we go in?

So A long, narrow, lofty building, stove-heated as usual, with four galleries, one above the other, going round it, and communicating by stairs. Between the two sides of each gallery, and in its centre, a bridge, for the greater convenience of crossing. On each of these bridges sits a man—dozing or reading, or talking to an idle companion. On each tier are two opposite rows of small iron doors. They look like furnace doors, but are cold and black, as though the fires within had all gone out. Some two or three are open, and women, with drooping heads bent down, are talking to the inmates. The whole is lighted by a skylight, but it is fast closed, and from the roof there dangle, limp and drooping, two useless windsals.

A man with keys appears, to show us round looking fellow, and, in his way, civil and obliging

"Are they all full?"

"Well, they're pretty nigh full, and that's a fact, and no two ways about it"

"Those at the bottom are unwholesome surely?"

"Why, we do only put coloured people in 'em—that's the truth"

"When do the prisoners take exercise?"

"Well, they do without it pretty much"

"Do they never walk in the yard?"

"Considerable seldom"

"Sometimes, I suppose?"

"Well, it's rare they do They keep pretty bright without it"

"But suppose a man were here for a twelvemonth I know this is only a prison for criminals who are charged with grave offences, while they are awaiting their trial, or are under remand, but the law here affords criminals many means of delay What with motions for new trials, and in arrest of judgment, and what not, a prisoner might be here for twelve months, I take it, might he not?"

"Well, I guess he might"

- "Do you mean to say that in all that time he would never come out at that little iron door for exercise?"
 - "He might walk some, perhaps-not much"

"Will you open one of the doors?"

"All, if you like"

The fastenings jar and rattle, and one of the doors turns slowly on its hinges Let us look in A small bare cell. into which the light enters through a high chink in the wall. There is a rude means of washing, a table, and a bedstead Upon the latter sits a man of sixty, reading He looks up for a moment, gives an impatient dogged shake, and fixes his eyes upon his book again. As we withdraw our heads the door closes on him, and is fastened as before This man has murdered his wife, and will probably be hanged

"How long has he been here?"

"A month"

"When will he be tried?"

"Next term"

"When is that?"

"Next month"

"In England, if a man be under sentence of death even. he has air and exercise at certain periods of the day"

"Possible?"

With what stupendous and untranslatable coolness he says this, and how loungingly he leads on to the women's side, making, as he goes, a kind of iron castanet of the key and the stair-rail

Each cell door on this side has a square aperture in it Some of the women peep anxiously through it at the sound of footsteps, others shrink away in shame. For what offence can that lonely child, of ten or twelve years old, be shut up here? Oh! that boy? He is the son of the prisoner we saw just now, is a witness against his father, and is detained here for safe keeping until the trial—that's all

But it is a dreadful place for the child to pass the long days and nights in This is rather hard treatment for a young witness, is it not? What says our conductor?

"Well, it an't a very rowdy life, and that's a fact!"

Again he clinks his metal castanet, and leads us leisurely away I have a question to ask him as we go

"Pray, why do they call this place The Tombs?"

"Well, it's the cant name"

"I know it is Why?"

"Some suicides happened here when it was first built I expect it come about from that"

"I saw just now that that man's clothes were scattered about the floor of his cell Don't you oblige the prisoners to be orderly, and put such things away?"

"Where should they put 'em?"

"Not on the ground surely What do you say to hanging them up?"

He stops and looks round to emphasize his answer,-

"Why, I say that's just it When they had hooks they would hang themselves, so they're taken out of every cell, and there's only the marks left where they used to be!"

The prison-yard in which he pauses now has been the scene of terrible performances. Into this narrow, grave like place men are brought out to die. The wretched creature stands beneath the gibbet on the ground, the rope about his neck, and when the sign is given, a weight at its other end comes running down, and swings him up into the air—a

The law requires that there be present at this dismal spectacle the judge, the jury, and citizens to the amount of twenty-five. From the community it is hidden. To the dissolute and bad the thing remains a frightful mystery. Between the criminal and them the prison wall is interposed as a thick, gloomy veil. It is the curtain to his bed of death, his winding-sheet, and grave. From him it shuts out life, and all the motives to unrepenting hardihood in that last hour which its mere sight and presence is often all-sufficient to sustain. There are no bold eyes to make him bold, no ruffians to uphold a ruffian's name before. All beyond the pitiless stone wall is unknown space.

Let us go forth again into the cheerful streets

Once more in Broadway! Here are the same dadies, in bright colours, walking to and fro, in pairs and singly, yonder the very same light blue parasol which passed and repassed the hotel window twenty times while we were sitting there. We are going to cross here. Take care of the pigs. Two portly sows are trotting up behind this carriage, and a select party of half a dozen gentlemen hogs have just now turned the corner.

Here is a solitary swine lounging homeward by himself He has only one ear, having parted with the other to vagrant dogs in the course of his city rambles But he gets on very well without it, and leads a roving, gentlemanly, vagabond kind of life, somewhat answering to that of our clubmen at home He leaves his lodgings every morning at a certain hour, throws himself upon the town, gets through his day in some manner quite satisfactory to himself, and regularly appears at the door of his own house again at night, like the mysterious master of Gil Blas He is a free-and easy, careless, indifferent kind of pig, having a very large acquaintance among other pigs of the same character, whom he rather knows by sight than conversation, as he seldom troubles himself to stop and exchange civilities, but goes grunting down the kennel, turning up the news and small talk of the city in the shape of cabbage stalks and offal, and bearing no tails but his own-which is a very short one, for his old enemies, the dogs, have been at that too, and have left him hardly enough to swear by He is in every respect a republican pig, going wherever he pleases, and mingling with the best society, on an equal, if not superior footing, for every one makes way when he appears, and the haughtiest give him the wall if he prefer it He is a great philosopher, and seldom moved, unless by the dogs before mentioned Sometimes, indeed, you may see his small eye twinkling on a slaughtered friend, whose carcass garnishes a butcher's doorpost, but he grunts out, "Such is life all flesh is pork!" buries his nose in the mire again, and waddles down the gutter, comforting himself with the reflection that there is one snout the less to anticipate stray cabbage-stalks, at any

blotches They have long, gaunt legs, too, and such peaked snouts, that if one of them could be persuaded to sit for his profile, nobody would recognize it for a pig's likeness They are never attended upon, or fed, or driven, or caught, but are thrown upon their own resources in early life, and become preternaturally knowing in consequence Every pig knows where he lives, much better than anybody could tell him At this hour, just as evening is closing in, you will see them roaming towards bed by scores, eating their way to the last Occasionally, some youth among them who has over-eaten himself, or has been much worned by dogs, trots shrinkingly homeward, like a prodigal son, but this is a rare case perfect self-possession and self-reliance, and immovable composure, being their foremost attributes

The streets and shops are lighted now, and as the eve travels down the long thoroughfare, dotted with bright jets of gas, it is reminded of Oxford Street or Piccadilly Here and there a flight of broad stone cellar-steps appears, and a painted lamp directs you to the Bowling Saloon, or Ten-Pin alley-Ten-Pins being a game of mingled chance and skill, invented when the legislature passed an Act forbidding Nine-Pins At other downward flights of steps are other lamps, marking the whereabouts of oyster-cellars—pleasant retreats, say I, not only by reason of their wonderful cookery of oysters, pretty nigh as large as cheese plates (or for thy dear sake, heartiest of Greek Professors!), but because of all kinds of eaters of fish, or flesh, or fowl, in these latitudes, the swallowers of oysters alone are not gregarious, but, subduing themselves, as it were, to the nature of what they work in, and copying the coyness of the thing they eat, do sit apart in curtained boxes, and consort by twos, not by two hundreds

But how quiet the streets are! Are there no itinerant bands, no wind or stringed instruments? No, not one By day, are there no Punches, Fantoccini, Dancing-dogs, Jugglers, Conjurers, Orchestrinas, or even Barrel-organs? No, not one Yes, I remember one. One barrel-organ and a dancing-monkey-sportive by nature, but fast fading into a dull, lumpish monkey, of the Utilitarian school Beyond that, nothing lively-no, not so much as a white mouse in a twirling cage.

Are there no amusements? Yes There is a lecture-room across the way, from which that glare of light proceeds, and there may be evening service for the ladies thrice a week, or For the young gentlemen there is the countinghouse, the store, the bar-room—the latter, as you may see through these windows, pretty full Hark! to the clinking sound of hammers breaking lumps of ice, and to the cool gurgling of the pounded bits, as, in the process of mixing, they are poured from glass to glass! No amusements? What are these suckers of cigars and swallowers of strong drinks, whose hats and legs we see in every possible variety of twist, doing but amusing themselves? What are the fifty newspapers, which those precocious urchins are bawling down the street, and which are kept filed within-what are they but amusements? Not vapid waterish amusements, but good strong stuff, dealing in round abuse and blackguard names. pulling off the roofs of private houses, as the Halting Devil did in Spain, pimping and pandering for all degrees of vicious taste, and gorging with coined lies the most voracious maw, imputing to every man in public life the coarsest and the vilest motives, scaring away from the stabbed and prostrate body-politic every Samaritan of clear conscience and good deeds, and setting on, with yell and whistle and the clapping of foul hands, the vilest vermin and worst birds of prey No amusements !

Let us go on again, and passing this wilderness of an hotel with stores about its base, like some Continental theatre, or the London Opera House shorn of its colonnade, plunge into the Five Points—But it is needful, first, that we take as our escort these two heads of the police, whom you would know for sharp and well-trained officers if you met them in the Great Desert.—So true it is that certain pursuits, whereever carried on, will stamp men with the same character These two might have been begotten, born, and bred in Bow

We have seen no beggars in the streets by night or day, but of other kinds of strollers, plenty Poverty, wretchedness, and vice are rife enough where we are going now

This is the place—these narrow ways, diverging to the right and left, and reeking everywhere with dirt and filth

Such lives as are led here bear the same fruits here as elsewhere. The coarse and bloated faces at the doors have counterparts at home and all the wide world over. De bauchery has made the very houses prematurely old. See how the rotten beams are tumbling down, and how the patched and broken windows seem to scowl dimly, like eyes that have been hurt in drunken frays. Many of those pigs live here. Do they ever wonder why their masters walk upright in lieu of going on all-fours? and why they talk instead of grunting?

So far nearly every house is a low tavern, and on the barroom walls are coloured prints of Washington, and Queen Victoria of England, and the American Eagle Among the pigeon-holes that hold the bottles are pieces of plate-glass and coloured paper, for there is, in some sort, a taste for decoration, even here And as seamen frequent these haunts, there are maritime pictures by the dozen of partings between sailors and their lady-loves, portraits of William, of the ballad, and his Black-Eyed Susan, of Will Watch, the Bold Smuggler, of Paul Jones the Pirate, and the like—on which the painted eyes of Queen Victoria, and of Washington to boot, rest in as strange companionship as on most of the scenes that are enacted in their wondering presence

What place is this to which the squalid street conducts us? A kind of square of leprous houses, some of which are attainable only by crazy wooden stairs without. What lies beyond this tottering flight of steps, that creak beneath our tread?—a miserable room, lighted by one dim candle, and destitute of all comfort, save that which may be hidden in a wretched bed. Beside it sits a man—his elbows on his knees, his forehead hidden in his hands. "What ails that man?" asks the foremost officer. "Fever," he sullenly replies, without looking up. Conceive the fancies of a fevered brain in such a place as this!

Ascend these pitch-dark stairs, heedful of a false footing on the trembling boards, and grope your way with me into this wolfish den, where neither ray of light nor breath of air appears to come A negro lad, startled from his sleep by the officer's voice—he knows it well—but comforted by his assurance that he has not come on business, officiously bestirs himself to light a candle. The match flickers for a moment, and shows great mounds of dusky rags upon the ground, then dies away, and leaves a denser darkness than before, if there can be degrees in such extremes. He stumbles down the stairs, and presently comes back, shading a flaring taper with his hand. Then the mounds of rags are seen to be astir, and rise slowly up, and the floor is covered with heaps of negro women, waking from their sleep—their white teeth chattering, and their bright eyes glistening and winking on all sides with surprise and fear, like the countless repetition of one astonished African face in some strange mirror.

Mount up these other stairs with no less caution (there are traps and pitfalls here for those who are not so well escorted as ourselves) into the housetop, where the bare beams and rafters meet overhead, and calm night looks down through the crevices in the roof. Open the door of one of these cramped hutches full of sleeping negroes. Pah! They have a charcoal fire within, there is a smell of singeing clothes, or flesh, so close they gather round the brazier, and vapours issue forth that blind and suffocate. From every corner, as you glance about you in these dark retreats, some figure crawls half awakened, as if the judgment-hour were near at hand, and every obscene grave were giving up its dead. Where dogs would howl to he, women, and men, and boys slink off to sleep, forcing the dislodged rats to move away in quest of better lodgings.

Here, too, are lanes and alleys, paved with mud knee deep, underground chambers, where they dance and game—the walls bedecked with rough designs of ships, and forts, and flags, and American eagles out of number, ruined houses, open to the street, whence, through wide gaps in the walls, other ruins loom upon the eye, as though the world of vice and misery had nothing else to show, hideous tenements which take their name from robbery and murder all that is loathsome, drooping, and decayed is here

Our leader has his hand upon the latch of "Almack's," and calls to us from the bottom of the steps, for the assembly-room of the Five Point fashionables is approached by a descent Shall we go in? It is but a moment

Heyday! the landlady of Almack's thrives!—a buxom fat mulatto woman, with sparkling eyes, whose head is daintily ornamented with a handkerchief of many colours. Nor is the landlord much behind her in his finery, being attired in a smart blue jacket, like a ship's steward, with a thick gold ring upon his little finger, and round his neck a gleaming golden watch-guard. How glad he is to see us! What will we please to call for? A dance? It shall be done directly, sir—"a regular break-down"

The corpulent black fiddler, and his friend who plays the tambourine, stamp upon the boarding of the small raised orchestra in which they sit, and play a lively measure. Five or six couple come upon the floor, marshalled by a lively young negro, who is the wit of the assembly, and the greatest dancer known. He never leaves off making queer faces, and is the delight of all the rest, who grin from ear to ear incessantly. Among the dancers are two young mulatto girls, with large, black, drooping eyes, and head-gear after the fashion of the hostess, who are as shy, or feight to be, as though they never danced before, and so look down before the visitors that their partners can see nothing but the long fringed lashes

But the dance commences Every gentleman sets as long as he likes to the opposite lady, and the opposite lady to him, and all are so long about it that the sport begins to languish, when suddenly the lively hero dashes in to the rescue Instantly the fiddler grins, and goes at it tooth and nail, there is new energy in the tambourine, new laughter in the dancers, new smiles in the landlady, new confidence in the landlord, new brightness in the very candles Single shuffle. double shuffle, cut and cross cut, snapping his fingers, rolling his eyes, turning in his knees, presenting the backs of his legs in front, spinning about on his toes and heels like nothing but the man's fingers on the tambourine, dancing with two left legs, two right legs, two wooden legs, two wire legs, two spring legs-all sorts of legs and no legs-what is this to him? And in what walk of life, or dance of life, does man ever get such stimulating applause as thunders about him, when, having danced his partner off her feet, and himself too, he finishes by leaping gloriously on the bar-counter, and calling for something to drink, with the chuckle of a million or counterfeit Jim Crows, in one inimitable sound!

The air, even in these distempered parts, is fresh after the stifling atmosphere of the houses, and now, as we emerge into a broader street, it blows upon us with a purer breath, and the stars look bright again. Here are The Tombs once more. The city watch-house is a part of the building. It follows naturally on the sights we have just left. Let us see that, and then to bed

What! do you thrust your common offenders against the police discipline of the town into such holes as these? Do men and women, against whom no crime is proved, lie here all night in perfect darkness, surrounded by the noisome vapours which encircle that flagging lamp you light us with, and breathing this filthy and offensive stench! Why, such indecent and disgusting dungeons as these cells would bring disgrace upon the most despotic empire in the world! Look at them, man—you, who see them every night, and keep the keys. Do you see what they are? Do you know how drains are made below the streets, and wherein these human sewers differ, except in being always stagnant?

Well, he don't know He has had five-and-twenty young women locked up in this very cell at one time, and you'd hardly realize what handsome faces there were among 'em

In God's name! shut the door upon the wretched creature who is in it now, and put its screen before a place quite unsurpassed in all the vice, neglect, and devilry of the worst old town in Europe

Are people really left all night, untried, in those black sties?—every night. The watch is set at seven in the evening. The magistrate opens his court at five in the morning. That is the earliest hour at which the first prisoner can be released, and if an officer appear against him, he is not taken out till nine o'clock or ten—But if any one among them die in the interval, as one man did, not long ago?—Then he is half eaten by the rats in an hour's time, as that man was, and there an end

What is this intolerable tolling of great bells, and crashing of wheels, and shouting in the distance? A fire And what that deep red light in the opposite direction? Another fire. And what these charred and blackened walls we stand before? A dwelling where a fire has been—It was more than hinted, in an official report, not long ago, that some of these conflagrations were not wholly accidental, and that speculation and enterprise found a field of exertion even in flames, but be this as it may, there was a fire last night, there are two to night, and you may lay an even wager there will be at least one to-morrow—So, carrying that with us for our comfort, let us say good-night, and climb upstairs to bed

One day, during my stay in New York, I paid a visit to the different public institutions on Long Island, or Rhode Island—I forget which One of them is a Lunatic Asylum The building is handsome, and is remarkable for a spacious and elegant staircase The whole structure is not yet finished, but it is already one of considerable size and extent, and is capable of accommodating a very large number of patients

I cannot say that I derived much comfort from the inspection of this charity The different wards might have been cleaner and better ordered, I saw nothing of that salutary system which had impressed me so favourably elsewhere. and everything had a lounging, listless, madhouse air, which was very painful The moping idiot, cowering down with long dishevelled hair, the gibbering maniac, with his hideous laugh and pointed finger, the vacant eye, the fierce, wild face, the gloomy picking of the hands and lips, and munching of the nails there they were all, without disguise, in naked ugliness and horror In the dining-room—a bare, dull, dreary place, with nothing for the eye to rest on but the empty walls-a woman was locked up alone She was bent, they told me, on committing suicide If anything could have strengthened her in her resolution, it would certainly have been the insupportable monotony of such an existence

The terrible crowd with which these halls and galleries were filled so shocked me, that I abridged my stay within the shortest limits, and declined to see that portion of the building in which the refractory and violent were under closer restraint. I have no doubt that the gentleman who presided over this establishment at the time I write of was competent to manage it, and had done all in his power to promote its usefulness, but will it be believed that the miserable strife of Party feeling is carried even into this sad refuge of afflicted and degraded humanity? Will it be believed that the eyes which are to watch over and control the wanderings of minds on which the most dreadful visitation to which our nature is exposed has fallen, must wear the glasses of some wretched side in Politics? Will it be believed that the governor of such a house as this is appointed and deposed, and changed perpetually, as Parties fluctuate and vary, and as their despicable weathercocks are blown this way or that? A hundred times in every week some new most paltry exhibition of that narrow-minded and injurious Party Spirit, which is the Simoom of America, sickening and blighting everything of wholesome life within its reach, was forced upon my notice, but I never turned my back upon it with feelings of such deep disgust and measureless contempt as when I crossed the threshold of this madhouse

At a short distance from this building is another, called the Alms House—that is to say, the workhouse of New York This is a large Institution also, lodging, I believe, when I was there, nearly a thousand poor—It was badly ventilated and badly lighted, was not too clean, and impressed me, on the whole, very uncomfortably—But it must be remembered that New York, as a great emporium of commerce, and as a place of general resort, not only from all parts of the States, but from most parts of the world, has always a large pauper population to provide for, and labours, therefore, under peculiar difficulties in this respect—Nor must it be forgotten that New York is a large town, and that in all large towns a wast amount of good and evil is intermixed and jumbled up together

In the same neighbourhood is the Farm, where young orphans are nursed and bred I did not see it, but I believe it is well conducted, and I can the more easily credit it, from knowing how mindful they usually are in America of that beautiful passage in the Litany which remembers all sick persons and young children

I was taken to these Institutions by water, in a boat belonging to the Island Jail, and rowed by a crew of prisoners, who were dressed in a striped uniform of black and buff, in which they looked like faded tigers They took me, by the same conveyance to the jail itself

It is an old prison, and quite a pioneer establishment, on the plan I have already described I was glad to hear this, for it is unquestionably a very indifferent one The most is made, however, of the means it possesses, and it is as well regulated as such a place can be

The women work in covered sheds erected for that purpose If I remember right, there are no shops for the men, but be that as it may, the greater part of them labour in certain stone-quarries near at hand. The day being very wet indeed, this labour was suspended, and the prisoners were in their cells. Imagine these cells, some two or three hundred in number, and in every one a man locked up, this one at his door for air, with his hands thrust through the grate, this one in bed (in the middle of the day, remember), and this one flung down in a heap upon the ground, with his head against the bars, like a wild beast. Make the rain pour down, outside, in torrents, put the everlasting stove in the midst—hot, and suffocating, and vaporous, as a witch's caldron, add a collection of gentle odours, such as would arise from a thousand mildewed umbrellas, wet through, and a thousand buck-baskets, full of half-washed linen—and there is the prison as it was that day

The prison for the State at Sing Sing is, on the other hand, a model jail That, and Auburn, are, I. believe, the largest and best examples of the silent system

In another part of the city is the Refuge for the Destitute, an institution whose object is to reclaim youthful offenders, male and female, black and white, without distinction, to teach them useful trades, apprentice them to respectable masters, and make them worthy members of society. Its design, it will be seen, is similar to that at Boston, and it is a no less meritorious and admirable establishment. A suspicion crossed my mind, during my inspection of this noble charity, whether the superintendent had quite sufficient knowledge of the world and worldly characters, and whether he did not commit a great mistake in treating some young girls, who were to all intents and purposes, by their years and their past lives, women, as though they were little children, which certainly had a ludicrous effect in my eyes, and, or I am much mistaken, in theirs also. As the institution, however, is always under the vigilant examination of a body of gentlemen of great intelligence and experience, it cannot fail to be well conducted, and whether I am right or wrong in this slight particular, is unimportant to its deserts and character, which it would be difficult to estimate too highly

In addition to these establishments, there are in New York excellent hospitals and schools, literary institutions and libraries, an admirable fire department (as indeed it should be, having constant practice), and charities of every sort and kind. In the suburbs there is a spacious cemetery, unfinished yet, but every day improving. The saddest tomb I saw there was "The Strangers' Grave." Dedicated to the different hotels

There are three principal theatres. Two of them, the Park and the Bowery, are large, elegant, and handsome buildings, and are, I grieve to write it, generally deserted. The third, the Olympic, is a tiny show-box for vaudevilles and burlesques. It is singularly well conducted by Mr. Mitchell, a comic actor of great quiet humour and originality, who is well remembered and esteemed by London play-goers. I am happy to report of this deserving gentleman, that his benches are usually well filled, and that his theatre rings with merriment every night. I had almost forgotten a small summer theatre, called Niblo's, with gardens and open-air amusements attached, but I believe it is not exempt from the general depression under which Theatrical Property, or what is humorously called by that name, unfortunately labours

The country round New York is surpassingly and exquisitely picturesque. The chimate, as I have already intimated, is somewhat of the warmest. What it would be, without the sea breezes which come from its beautiful bay in the evening time, I will not throw myself or my readers into a fever by inquiring

The tone of the best society in this city is like that of Boston, here and there, it may be, with a greater infusion of the mercantile spirit, but generally polished and refined, and always most hospitable The houses and tables are elegant, the hours later and more rakish, and there is, perhaps, a greater spirit of contention in reference to appearances, and the display of wealth and costly living. The ladies are singularly beautiful

Before I left New York I made arrangements for securing a passage home in the George Washington packet ship, which was advertised to sail in June—that being the month in which I had determined, if prevented by no accident in the course of my ramblings, to leave America

I never thought that going back to England, returning to all who are dear to me, and to pursuits that have insensibly grown to be part of my nature, I could have felt so much sorrow as I endured, when I parted at last, on board this ship, with the friends who had accompanied me from this city. I never thought the name of any place, so far away and so lately known, could ever associate itself in my mind with the crowd of affectionate remembrances that now cluster about it. There are those in this city who would brighten, to me, the darkest winter-day that ever glimmered and went out in Lapland, and before whose presence even Home grew dim, when they and I exchanged that painful word which mingles with our every thought and deed, which haunts our cradle-heads in infancy, and closes up the vista of our lives in ag

PHILADELPHIA, AND ITS SOLITARY PRISON

The journey from New York to Philadelphia is made by railroad, and two ferries, and usually occupies between five and six hours. It was a fine evening when we were passengers in the train, and watching the bright sunset from a little window near the door by which we sat, my attention was attracted to a remarkable appearance issuing from the windows of the gentlemen's car immediately in front of us, which I supposed for some time was occasioned by a number of industrious persons inside ripping open feather-beds, and giving the feathers to the wind. At length it occurred to me that they were only spitting, which was indeed the case, though how any number of passengers which it was possible for that car to contain could have maintained such a playful and incessant shower of expectoration, I am still at a loss to understand, notwithstanding the experience in all salivatory phenomena which I afterwards acquired

I made acquaintance, on this journey, with a mild and modest young Quaker, who opened the discourse by informing me, in a grave whisper, that his grandfather was the inventor of cold-drawn castor oil I mention the circumstance here, thinking it probable that this is the first occasion on which the valuable medicine in question was ever used as a conversational aperient

We reached the city late that night Looking out of my chamber-window, before going to bed, I saw, on the opposite side of the way, a handsome building of white marble, which had a mournful, ghostlike aspect, dreary to behold I attributed this to the sombre influence of the night, and on rising in the morning looked out again, expecting to see its steps and portico thronged with groups of people passing in and out The door was still tight shut, however, the same cold cheerless air prevailed, and the building looked as if the marble statue of Don Guzman could alone have any business to transact within its gloomy walls I hastened to inquire its name and purpose, and then my surprise vanished It was the Tomb of many fortunes—the Great Catacomb of investment-the memorable United States Bank

The stoppage of this bank, with all its ruinous consequences. had cast (as I was told on every side) a gloom on Philadelphia, under the depressing effect of which it yet laboured It certainly did seem rather dull and out of spirits

It is a handsome city, but distractingly regular After walking about it for an hour or two, I felt that I would have given the world for a crooked street The collar of my coat appeared to stiffen, and the brim of my hat to expand, beneath its Quakerly influence My hair shrunk into a sleek short crop, my hands folded themselves upon my breast of their own calm accord, and thoughts of taking lodgings in Mark Lane over against the Market Place, and of making a large fortune by speculations in corn, came over me involuntarily. Philadelphia is most bountifully provided with fresh water, which is showered and jerked about, and turned on, and poured off everywhere The Waterworks, which are on a height near the city, are no less ornamental than useful, being tastefully laid out as a public garden, and kept in the best and neatest order. The river is dammed at this point, and forced by its own power into certain high tanks or reservoirs, whence the whole city, to the top stones of the houses, is supplied at a very trifling expense.

There are various public institutions among them a most excellent Hospital—a Quaker establishment, but not sectarian in the great benefits it confers, a quiet, quaint old Library, named after Franklin, a handsome Exchange and Post Office, and so forth—In connection with the Quaker Hospital, there is a picture by West, which is exhibited for the benefit of the funds of the institution—The subject is, our Saviour healing the sick, and it is, perhaps, as favourable a specimen of the master as can be seen anywhere—Whether this be high or low praise, depends upon the reader's taste

In the same room there is a very characteristic and lifelike portrait by Mr Sully, a distinguished American artist

My stay in Philadelphia was very short, but what I saw of its society I greatly liked Treating of its general characteristics, I should be disposed to say that it is more provincial than Boston or New York, and that there is affoat in the fair city an assumption of taste and criticism savouring rather of those genteel discussions upon the same themes, in connection with Shakespeare and the Musical Glasses, of which we read in the "Vicar of Wakefield" Near the city is a most splendid unfinished marble structure for the Girard College, founded by a deceased gentleman of that name and of enormous wealth, which, if completed according to the original design, will be perhaps the richest edifice of modern But the bequest is involved in legal disputes, and pending them the work has stopped, so that like many other great undertakings in America, even this is rather going to be done one of these days, than doing now

In the outskirts stands a great prison, called the Eastern Penitentiary, conducted on a plan peculiar to the state of Pennsylvania. The system here is rigid, strict, and hopeless solitary confinement. I believe it, in its effects, to be cruel and wrong

In its intention, I am well convinced that it is kind, humane, and meant for reformation, but I am persuaded that those who devised this system of prison discipline, and those benevolent gentlemen who carry it into execution, do not know what it is that they are doing I believe that very few men are capable of estimating the immense amount of torture and agony which this dreadful punishment, prolonged for years, inflicts upon the sufferers, and in guessing at it myself, and in reasoning from what I have seen written upon their faces, and what to my certain knowledge they feel within, I am only the more convinced that there is a depth of terrible endurance in it which none but the sufferers themselves can fathom, and which no man has a right to inflict upon his fellow creature I hold this slow and daily tampering with the mysteries of the brain to be immeasurably worse than any torture of the body, and because its ghastly signs and tokens are not so palpable to the eye and sense of touch as scars upon the flesh-because its wounds are not upon the surface, and it extorts few cries that human ears can heartherefore I the more denounce it, as a secret punishment which slumbering humanity is not roused up to stay I hesitated once, debating with myself whether, if I had the power of saying "Yes" or "No," I would allow it to be tried in certain cases, where the terms of imprisonment were short. but now I solemnly declare, that with no rewards or honours could I walk a happy man beneath the open sky by day, or lay me down upon my bed at night, with the consciousness that one human creature, for any length of time, no matter what, lay suffering this unknown punishment in his silent cell, and I the cause, or I consenting to it in the least degree

I was accompanied to this prison by two gentlemen officially connected with its management, and passed the day in going from cell to cell, and talking with the inmates. Every facility was afforded me that the utmost courtesy could suggest. Nothing was concealed or hidden from my view, and every piece of information that I sought was openly and frankly given. The perfect order of the building cannot be praised too highly, and of the excellent motives of all who are immediately concerned in the administration of the system there can be no kind of question. Between the body of the prison and the outer wall there is a spacious garden. Entering it, by a wicket in the massive gate, we pursued the path before us to its other termination, and passed into a large chamber, from which seven long passages radiate. On either side of each is a long, long row of low cell doors, with a certain number over every one Above, a gallery of cells like those below, except that they have no narrow yard attached (as those in the ground tier have), and are somewhat smaller. The possession of two of these is supposed to compensate for the absence of so much air and exercise as can be had in the dull strip attached to each of the others, in an hour's time every day, and there fore every prisoner in this upper story has two cells, adjoining and communicating with each other.

Standing at the central point, and looking down these dreary passages, the dull repose and quiet that prevails is awful Occasionally there is a drowsy sound from some lone weaver's shuttle or shoemaker's last, but it is stifled by the thick walls and heavy dungeon door, and only serves to make the general stillness more profound. Over the head and face of every prisoner who comes into this melancholy house a black hood is drawn, and in this dark shroud, an emblem of the curtain dropped between him and the living world, he is led to the cell from which he never again comes forth, until his whole term of imprisonment has expired He never hears of wife or children, home or friends, the life or death of any single creature . He sees the prison officers, but with that exception he never looks upon a human countenance or hears a human voice He is a man buned alive, to be dug out in the slow round of years, and in the meantime dead to everything but torturing anxieties and horrible despair

His name, and crime, and term of suffering are unknown, even to the officer who delivers him his daily food. There is a number over his cell-door, and in a book of which the governor of the prison has one copy, and the moral instructor another this is the index of his history. Beyond these pages the prison has no record of his existence, and though he live to be in the same cell ten weary years, he has no means of knowing, down to the very last hour, in what part of the building it is situated, what kind of men there are about him, whether in the long winter nights there are living people near, or he is in some lonely corner of the great jail, with walls, and passages, and iron doors between him and the nearest sharer in its solitary horrors

Every cell has double doors—the outer one of sturdy oak, the other of grated 1100, wherein there is a trap through which his food is handed. He has a Bible, and a slate and pencil, and, under certain restrictions, has sometimes other books provided for the purpose, and pen and ink and paper. His razor, plate, and can, and basin hang upon the wall, or shine upon the little shelf. Fresh water is laid on in every cell, and he can draw it at his pleasure. During the day, his bedstead turns up against the wall, and leaves more space for him to work in. His loom, or bench, or wheel is there, and there he labours, sleeps and wakes, and counts the seasons as they change, and grows old.

The first man I saw was seated at his loom, at work He had been there six years, and was to remain, I think, three more He had been convicted as a receiver of stolen goods, but even after his long imprisonment, denied his guilt, and said he had been hardly dealt by It was his second offence

He stopped his work when we went in, took off his spectacles, and answered freely to everything that was said to him, but always with a strange kind of pause first, and in a low, thoughtful voice. He wore a paper hat of his own making, and was pleased to have it noticed and commended. He had very ingeniously manufactured a sort of Dutch clock from some disregarded odds and ends, and his vinegar bottle served for the pendulum. Seeing me interested in this contrivance, he looked up at it with a great deal of pride, and said that he had been thinking of improving it, and that he hoped the hammer and a little piece of broken glass beside it "would play music before long". He had extracted some colours from the yarn with which he worked, and painted a few poor figures on the wall. One, of a female, over the door, he called "The Lady of the Lake"

He smiled as I looked at these contrivances to while away the time, but when I looked from them to him, I saw that his lip trembled, and could have counted the beating of his heart I forgot how it came about, but some allusion was made to his having a wife He shook his head at the word, turned aside, and covered his face with his hands

"But you are resigned now!" said one of the gentlemen, after a short pause, during which he had resumed his former manner. He answered with a sigh that seemed quite reckless in its hopelessness, "Oh, yes! oh, yes! I am resigned to it!" "And are a better man, you think?" "Well, I hope so, I'm sure I hope I may be!" "And time goes pretty quickly?" "Time is very long, gentlemen, within these four walls!"

He gazed about him—Heaven only knows how wearily!—as he said these words, and in the act of doing so, fell into a strange stare, as if he had forgotten something. A moment afterwards he sighed heavily, put on his spectacles, and went about his work again

In another cell there was a German, sentenced to five years' imprisonment for larceny, two of which had just expired With colours procured in the same manner, he had painted every inch of the walls and ceiling quite beautifully He had laid out the few feet of ground, behind, with exquisite neatness, and had made a little bed in the centre, that looked by-the-bye like a grave The taste and ingenuity he had displayed in everything were most extraordinary, and yet a more dejected, heart-broken, wretched creature it would be difficult to imagine I never saw such a picture of forlorn affliction and distress of mind My heart bled for him, and when the tears ran down his cheeks, and he took one of the visitors aside, to ask, with his trembling hands nervously clutching at his coat to detain him, whether there was no hope of his dismal sentence being commuted, the spectacle was really too painful to witness. I never saw or heard of any kind of misery that impressed me more than the wretchedness of this man

In a third cell was a tall strong black, a burglar, working at his proper trade of making screws and the like. His time was nearly out. He was not only a very dexterous thief, but was notorious for his boldness and hardihood, and for the number of his previous convictions. He entertained us with a long account of his achievements, which he narrated with such infinite relish, that he actually seemed to lick his lips as he told us racy anecdotes of stolen plate, and of old ladies whom he had watched as they sat at windows in silver spectacles (he had plainly had an eye to their metal even from the other side of the street), and had afterwards robbed This fellow, upon the slightest encouragement, would have mingled with his professional recollections the most detestable cant, but I am very much mistaken if he could have surpassed the unmitigated hypocrisy with which he declared that he blessed the day on which he came into that prison, and that he never would commit another robbery as long as he lived

There was one man who was allowed, as an indulgence, to keep rabbits His room having rather a close smell in consequence, they called to him at the door to come out into the passage He complied of course, and stood shading his haggard face in the unwonted sunlight of the great window, looking as wan and unearthly as if he had been summoned from the grave He had a white rabbit in his breast, and when the little creature, getting down upon the ground, stole back into the cell, and he, being dismissed, crept timidly after it, I thought it would have been very hard to say in what respect the man was the nobler animal of the two

There was an English thief, who had been there but a few days out of seven years—a villamous, low-browed, thin-lipped fellow, with a white face, who had as yet no relish for visitors, and who, but for the additional penalty, would have gladly stabbed me with his shoemaker's knife. There was another German, who had entered the jail but yesterday, and who started from his bed when we looked in, and pleaded, in his broken English, very hard for work. There was a poet. who after doing two days' work in every four-and-twenty hours, one for himself and one for the prison, wrote verses about ships (he was by trade a mariner), and "the maddening wine-cup," and his friends at home. There were very many of them Some reddened at the sight of visitors, and some turned very pale Some two or three had prisoner nurses with them, for they were very sick, and one, a fat old negro whose leg had been taken off within the jail, had for his attendant a classical scholar and an accomplished surgeon, himself a prisoner likewise. Sitting upon the stairs, engaged in some slight work, was a pretty coloured boy. "Is there no Refuge for young criminals in Philadelphia, then?" said I. "Yes, but only for white children." Noble aristoc racy in crime!

There was a sailor who had been there upwards of eleven years, and who in a few months' time would be free Eleven years of solitary confinement!

"I am very glad to hear your time is nearly out" What does he say? Nothing Why does he stare at his hands, and pick the flesh upon his fingers, and raise his eyes for an instant, every now and then, to those bare walls which have seen his head turn grey? It is a way he has sometimes Does he never look men in the face, and does he always pluck at those hands of his, as though he were bent on parting skin and bone? It is his humour, nothing more

It is his humour, too, to say that he does not look forward to going out, that he is not glad the time is drawing near, that he did look forward to it once, but that was very long ago, that he has lost all care for everything. It is his humour to be a helpless, crushed, and broken man. And, Heaven be his witness that he has his humour thoroughly gratified!

There were three young women in adjoining cells, all con victed at the same time of a conspiracy to rob their prose-In the silence and solitude of their lives they had grown to be quite beautiful Their looks were very sad, and might have moved the sternest visitor to tears, but not to that kind of sorrow which the contemplation of the men awakens One was a young girl, not twenty, as I recollect, whose snowwhite room was hung with the work of some former prisoner, and upon whose downcast face the sun in all its splendour shone down through the high chink in the wall, where one narrow strip of bright blue sky was visible She was very penitent and quiet, had come to be resigned, she said (and I believe her), and had a mind at peace. "In a word, you are happy here?" said one of my companions She struggled -she did struggle very hard-to answer, Yes, but raising her eyes, and meeting that glimpse of freedom overhead, she burst into tears, and said, "She tried to be, she uttered no complaint, but it was natural that she should sometimes long to go out of that one cell She could not help that," she sobbed, poor thing!

I went from cell to cell that day, and every face I saw, or word I heard, or incident I noted, is present to my mind in all its painfulness. But let me pass them by for one more pleasant glance of a prison on the same plan which I afterwards saw at Pittsburg.

When I had gone over that in the same manner, I asked the governor if he had any person in his charge who was shortly going out He had one, he said, whose time was up next day, but he had only been a prisoner two years

Two years! I looked back through two years of my own life—out of jail, prosperous, happy, surrounded by blessings, comforts, and good fortune—and thought how wide a gap it was, and how long those two years passed in solitary captivity would have been. I have the face of this man, who was going to be released next day, before me now. It is almost more memorable in its happiness than the other faces in their misery. How easy and how natural it was for him to say that the system was a good one, and that the time went "pretty quick—considering," and that when a man once felt he had offended the law, and must satisfy it, "he got along somehow," and so forth!

"What did he call you back to say to you in that strange flutter?" I asked of my conductor, when he had locked the door and joined me in the passage

"Oh! That he was afraid the soles of his boots were not fit for walking, as they were a good deal worn when he came in, and that he would thank me very much to have them mended, ready"

Those boots had been taken off his feet, and put away with the rest of his clothes, two years before !

I took that opportunity of inquiring how they conducted themselves immediately before going out, adding that I presumed they trembled very much

"Well, it's not so much a trembling," was the answer— "though they do quiver—as a complete derangement of the nervous system They can't sign their names to the booksometimes can't even hold the pen, look about 'em without appearing to know why, or where they are, and sometimes get up and sit down again twenty times in a minute. This is when they're in the office, where they are taken with the hood on, as they were brought in. When they get outside the gate, they stop, and look first one way and then the other, not knowing which to take. Sometimes they stagger as if they were drunk, and sometimes are forced to lean against the fence, they're so bad, but they clear off in course of time."

As I walked among these solitary cells, and looked at the faces of the men within them, I tried to picture to myself the thoughts and feelings natural to their condition. I imagined the hood just taken off, and the scene of their captivity disclosed to them in all its dismal monotony

At first the man is stunned His confinement is a hideous vision, and his old life a reality. He throws himself upon his bed, and lies there abandoned to despair. By degrees the insupportable solitude and barrenness of the place rouses him from this stupor, and when the trap in his grated door is opened he humbly begs and prays for work "Give me some work to do, or I shall go raving mad!"

He has it, and by fits and starts applies himself to labour, but every now and then there comes upon him a burning sense of the years that must be wasted in that stone coffin, and an agony so piercing in the recollection of those who are hidden from his view and knowledge, that he starts from his seat, and striding up and down the narrow room with both hands clasped on his uplifted head, hears spirits tempting him to beat his brains out on the wall

Again he falls upon his bed, and lies there moaning Suddenly he starts up, wondering whether any other man is near—whether there is another cell like that on either side of him—and listens keenly

There is no sound, but other prisoners may be near for all that He remembers to have heard once, when he little thought of coming here himself, that the cells were so con structed that the prisoners could not hear each other, though the officers could hear them Where is the nearest manupon the right or on the left? or is there one in both directions? Where is he sitting now—with his face to the light? or is he walking to and fro? How is he dressed? Has he been here long? Is he much worn away? Is he very white and spectrelike? Does he think of his neighbour too?

Scarcely venturing to breathe, and listening while he thinks, he conjures up a figure with his back towards him, and imagines it moving about in this next cell. He has no idea of the face, but he is certain of the dark form of a stooping man. In the cell upon the other side he puts another figure, whose face is hidden from him also. Day after day, and often when he wakes up in the middle of the night, he thinks of these two men until he is almost distracted. He never changes them. There they are always as he first imagined them—an old man on the right, a younger man upon the left—whose hidden features torture him to death, and have a mystery that makes him tremble

The weary days pass on with solemn pace, like mourners at a funeral, and slowly he begins to feel that the white walls of the cell have something dreadful in them—that their colour is horrible—that their smooth surface chills his blood—that there is one hateful corner which torments him—Every morning when he wakes he hides his face beneath the coverlet, and shudders to see the ghastly ceiling looking down upon him. The blessed light of day itself peeps in, an ugly phantom face, through the unchangeable crevice which is his prison window.

By slow but sure degrees the terrors of that hateful corner swell until they beset him at all times—invade his rest, make his dreams hideous, and his nights dreadful. At first he took a strange dislike to it, feeling as though it gave birth in his brain to something of corresponding shape which ought not to be there, and racked his head with pains. Then he began to fear it, then to dream of it, and of men whispering its name and pointing to it. Then he could not bear to look at it, nor yet to turn his back upon it. Now it is every night the lurking place of a ghost, a shadow—a silent something, horrible to see, but whether bird, or beast, or muffled human shape, he cannot tell

When he is in his cell by day, he fears the little yard without When he is in the yard, he dreads to re-enter the cell. When night comes, there stands the phantom in the corner

If he have the courage to stand in its place, and drive it out (he had once, being desperate), it broods upon his bed. In the twilight, and always at the same hour, a voice calls to him by name. As the darkness thickens, his loom begins to live, and even that, his comfort, is a hideous figure, watching him till daybreak.

Again, by slow degrees, these horrible fancies depart from him one by one, returning sometimes unexpectedly, but at longer intervals, and in less alarming shapes. He has talked upon religious matters with the gentleman who visits him, and has read his Bible, and has written a prayer upon his slate, and hung it up as a kind of protection and an assurance of heavenly companionship. He dreams now, sometimes, of his children or his wife, but is sure that they are dead, or have deserted him. He is easily moved to tears, is gentle, submissive, and broken spirited. Occasionally the old agony comes back—a very little thing will revive it, even a familiar sound, or the scent of summer flowers in the air—but it does not last long now, for the world without has come to be the vision, and this solitary life the sad reality

If his term of imprisonment be short—I mean comparatively, for short it cannot be—the last half-year is almost worse than all, for then he thinks the prison will take fire and he be burnt in the ruins, or that he is doomed to die within the walls, or that he will be detained on some false charge and sentenced for another, term, or that something, no matter what, must happen to prevent his going at large. And this is natural, and impossible to be reasoned against, because, after his long separation from human life, and his great suffering, any event will appear to him more probable in the contemplation than the being restored to liberty and his fellow-creatures

If his period of confinement have been very long, the prospect of release bewilders and confuses him. His broken heart may flutter for a moment when he thinks of the world outside, and what it might have been to him in all those lonely years, but that is all. The cell-door has been closed too long on all its hopes and cares. Better to have hanged him in the beginning than bring him to this pass, and send him forth to mingle with his kind, who are his kind no more.

On the haggard face of every man among these prisoners the same expression sat I know not what to liken it to It had something of that strained attention which we see upon the faces of the blind and deaf, mingled with a kind of horror, as though they had all been secretly terrified In every little chamber that I entered, and at every grate through which I looked, I seemed to see the same appalling countenance It lives in my memory with the fascination of a remarkable picture Parade before my eyes a hundred men, with one among them newly released from this solitary suffering, and I would point him out

The faces of the women, as I have said, it humanizes and refines Whether this be because of their better nature, which is elicited in solitude, or because of their being gentler creatures, of greater patience and longer suffering, I do not know, but so it is That the punishment is nevertheless, to my thinking, fully as cruel and as wrong in their case as in that of the men, I need scarcely add

My firm conviction is that, independent of the mental anguish it occasions—an anguish so acute and so tremendous, that all imagination of it must fall far short of the reality—it wears the mind into a morbid state, which renders it unfit for the rough contact and busy action of the world. It is my fixed opinion that those who have undergone this punishment MUST pass into society again morally unhealthy and diseased. There are many instances on record of men who have chosen, or have been condemned, to lives of perfect solitude, but I scarcely remember one, even among sages of strong and vigorous intellect, where its effect has not become apparent in some disordered train of thought or some gloomy What monstrous phantoms, bred of despondhallucination ency and doubt, and born and reared in solitude, have stalked upon the earth, making creation ugly, and darkening the face of heaven!

Suicides are rare among these prisoners—are almost, indeed, unknown But no argument in favour of the system can reasonably be deduced from this circumstance, although it is very often urged. All men who have made diseases of the mind their study know perfectly well that such extreme depression and despair as will change the whole character, and beat down all its powers of elasticity and self-resistance, may be at work within a man, and yet stop short of selfdestruction. This is a common case

That it makes the senses dull, and by degrees impairs the bodily faculties, I am quite sure—I remarked to those who were with me in this very establishment at Philadelphia, that the crimmals who had been there long were deaf—They, who were in the habit of seeing these men constantly, were perfectly amazed at the idea, which they regarded as groundless and fanciful—And yet the very first prisoner to whom they appealed—one of their own selection—confirmed my impression (which was unknown to him) instantly, and said, with a genuine air it was impossible to doubt, that he couldn't think how it happened, but he was growing very dull of hearing—That it is a singularly unequal punishment, and affects the

That it is a singularly unequal punishment, and affects the worst man least, there is no doubt. In its superior efficiency as a means of reformation, compared with that other code of regulations which allows the prisoners to work in company without communicating together, I have not the smallest faith. All the instances of reformation that were mentioned to me were of a kind that might have been—and I have no doubt whatever, in my own mind, would have been—equally well brought about by the Silent System. With regard to such men as the negro burglar and the English thief, even the most enthusiastic have scarcely any hope of their conversion.

It seems to me that the objection that nothing wholesome or good has ever had its growth in such unnatural solitude, and that even a dog or any of the more intelligent among beasts would pine, and mope, and rust away beneath its influence, would be in itself a sufficient argument against this system. But when we recollect, in addition, how very cruel and severe it is, and that a solitary life is always liable to peculiar and distinct objections of a most deplorable nature, which have arisen here—and call to mind, moreover, that the choice is not between this system and a bad or ill-considered one, but between it and another which has worked well, and is, in its whole design and practice, excellent—there is surely more than sufficient reason for abandoning a mode of punishment attended by so little hope or promise, and fraught, beyond dispute, with such a host of evils

As a relief to its contemplation, I will close this chapter with a curious story arising out of the same theme, which was related to me, on the occasion of this visit, by some of the gentlemen concerned

At one of the periodical meetings of the inspectors of this prison, a working-man of Philadelphia presented himself before the Board, and earnestly requested to be placed in solitary confinement. On being asked what motive could possibly prompt him to make this strange demand, he answered that he had an irresistible propensity to get drunk, that he was constantly indulging it, to his great misery and ruin, that he had no power of resistance, that he wished to be put beyond the reach of temptation, and that he could think of no better way than this. It was pointed out to him, in reply, that the prison was for criminals who had been tried and sentenced by the law, and could not be made available for any such fanciful purposes. He was exhorted to abstain from intoxicating drinks, as he surely might if he would, and received other very good advice, with which he retired, exceedingly dissatisfied with the result of his application.

He came again, and again, and again, and was so very earnest and importunate, that at last they took counsel together, and said, "He will certainly qualify himself for admission if we reject him any more. Let us shut him up. He will soon be glad to go away, and then we shall get rid of him." So they made him sign a statement which would prevent his ever sustaining an action for false imprisonment, to the effect that his incarceration was voluntary and of his own seeking, they requested him to take notice that the officer in attendance had orders to release him at any hour of the day or night, when he might knock upon his door for that purpose, but desired him to understand that once going out, he would not be admitted any more. These conditions agreed upon, and he still remaining in the same mind, he was conducted to the prison, and shut up in one of the cells

In this cell the man, who had not the firmness to leave a glass of liquor standing untasted on a table before him—in this cell, in solitary confinement, and working every day at his trade of shoemaking, this man remained nearly two years. His health beginning to fail at the expiration of that time, the surgeon recommended that he should work occasionally in the garden, and as he liked the notion very much, he went about this new occupation with great cheerfulness

He was digging here, one summer day, very industriously, when the wicket in the outer gate chanced to be left open, showing, beyond, the well-remembered dusty road and sunburnt fields. The way was as free to him as to any man living, but he no sooner raised his head and caught sight of it, all shining in the light, than, with the involuntary instinct of a prisoner, he cast away his spade, scampered off as fast as his legs would carry him, and never once looked back

WASHINGTON THE LEGISLATURE AND THE PRESIDENT'S HOUSE

WE left Philadelphia by steamboat at six o'clock one very cold morning, and turned our faces towards Washington

In the course of this day's journey, as on subsequent occa sions, we encountered some Englishmen (small farmers, per haps, or country publicans at home) who were settled in America, and were travelling on their own affairs. Of all grades and kinds of men that jostle one in the public conveyances of the States, these are often the most intolerable and the most insufferable companions. United to every disagreeable characteristic that the worst kind of American travellers possess, these countrymen of ours display an amount of insolent conceit and cool assumption of superiority quite monstrous to behold. In the coarse familiarity of their approach, and the effrontery of their inquisitiveness (which they are in great haste to assert, as if they panted to revenge themselves upon the decent old restraints of home), they surpass any native specimens that came within my range of observation, and I often grew so patriotic when I saw and heard them, that I would cheerfully have submitted to a reasonable fine if I could have given any other country in the whole world the honour of claiming them for its children

As Washington may be called the headquarters of tobacco-

tinctured saliva, the time is come when I must confess, without any disguise, that the prevalence of those two odious practices of chewing and expectorating began about this time to be anything but agreeable, and soon became most offensive and sickening In all the public places of America this filthy custom is recognized. In the courts of law the judge has his spittoon, the crier his, the witness his, and the prisoner his, while the jurymen and spectators are provided for, as so many men who, in the course of nature, must desire to spit incessantly In the hospitals the students of medicine are requested, by notices upon the wall, to eject their tobacco juice into the boxes provided for that purpose, and not to discolour the stairs In public buildings visitors are implored. through the same agency, to squirt the essence of their quids or "plugs," as I have heard them called by gentlemen learned in this kind of sweetmeat, into the national spittoons, and not about the bases of the marble columns But in some parts this custom is inseparably mixed up with every meal and morning call, and with all the transactions of social life stranger, who follows in the track I took myself, will find it in its full bloom and glory, luxuriant in all its alarming recklessness, at Washington And let him not persuade himself (as I once did, to my shame) that previous tourists have exaggerated its extent The thing itself is an exaggeration of nastiness which cannot be outdone

On board this steamboat there were two young gentlemen, with shirt collars reversed as usual, and armed with very big walking-sticks, who planted two seats in the middle of the deck at a distance of some four paces apart, took out their tobacco-boxes, and sat down opposite each other to chew In less than a quarter of an hour's time these hopeful youths had shed about them on the clean boards a copious shower of yellow rain, clearing, by that means, a kind of magic circle, within whose limits no intruders dared to come, and which they never failed to refresh and re-refresh before a spot was dry This being before breakfast, rather disposed me, I confess, to nausea, but looking attentively at one of the expectorators, I plainly saw that he was young in chewing, and felt inwardly uneasy himself A glow of delight came over me at this discovery, and as I marked his face turn paler and paler, and saw the ball of tobacco in his left cheek quiver with his suppressed agony, while yet he spat, and chewed, and spat again, in emulation of his older friend, I could have fallen on his neck and implored him to go on for hours

We all sat down to a comfortable breakfast in the cabin below, where there was no more hurry or confusion than at such a meal in England, and where there was certainly greater politeness exhibited than at most of our stage-coach banquets. At about nine o'clock we arrived at the railroad station, and went on by the cars. At noon we turned out again, to cross a wide river in another steamboat, landed at a continuation of the railroad on the opposite shore, and went on by other cars, in which, in the course of the next hour or so, we crossed by wooden bridges, each a mile in length, two creeks, called respectively Great and Little Gunpowder. The water in both was blackened with flights of canvas-backed ducks, which are most delicious eating, and abound hereabouts at that season of the year.

These bridges are of wood, have no parapet, and are only just wide enough for the passage of the trains, which, in the event of the smallest accident, would inevitably be plunged into the river. They are startling contrivances, and are most agreeable when passed

We stopped to dine at Baltimore, and being now in Maryland, were waited on, for the first time, by slaves The sensation of exacting any service from human creatures who are bought and sold, and being, for the time, a party, as it were, to their condition, is not an enviable one. The institution exists, perhaps, in its least repulsive and most mitigated form in such a town as this. But it is slavery, and though I was, with respect to it, an innocent man, its presence filled me with a sense of shame and self-reproach.

After dinner we went down to the railroad again, and took our seats in the cars for Washington Being rather early, those men and boys who happened to have nothing particular to do, and were curious in foreigners, came (according to custom) round the carriage in which I sat, let down all the windows, thrust in their heads and shoulders, hooked themselves on conveniently by their elbows, and fell to comparing notes on the subject of my personal appearance, with as much indifference as if I were a stuffed figure I never gained so much uncompromising information with reference to my own nose and eyes, the various impressions wrought by my mouth and chin on different minds, and how my head looks when it is viewed from behind, as on these occasions Some gentlemen were only satisfied by exercising their sense of touch, and the boys (who are surprisingly precocious in America) were seldom satisfied, even by that, but would return to the charge over and over again Many a budding president has walked into my room with his cap on his head and his hands in his pockets, and stared at me for two whole hours—occasionally refreshing himself with a tweak at his nose, or a draught from the water-jug, or by walking to the windows and inviting other boys in the street below to come up and do likewise, crying, "Here he is!" "Come on!" "Bring all your brothers!" with other hospitable entreaties of that nature

We reached Washington at about half-past six that evening, and had upon the way a beautiful view of the Capitol, which is a fine building of the Corinthian order, placed upon a noble and commanding eminence. Arrived at the hotel, I saw no more of the place that night, being very tired, and glad to get to bed

Breakfast over next morning, I walk about the streets for an hour or two, and, coming home, throw up the window in the front and back, and look out Here is Washington, fresh in my mind and under my eye

Take the worst parts of the City Road and Pantonville, or the straggling outskirts of Paris, where the houses are smallest, preserving all their oddities, but especially the small shops and dwellings occupied in Pentonville (but not in Washington) by furniture-brokers, keepers of poor eating-houses, and fanciers of birds. Burn the whole down, build it up again in wood and plaster, widen it a little, throw in part of St John's Wood, put green blinds outside all the private houses, with a red curtain and a white one in every window, plough up all the roads, plant a great deal of coarse turf in every place where it ought not to be, erect three handsome buildings in stone and marble, anywhere, but the more entirely out of everybody's way the better, call one the Post Office, one the Patent Office, and one the Treasury, make it scorching hot in the morning, and freezing cold in the afternoon, with an occasional tornado of wind and dust, leave a brick-field without the bricks, in all central places where a street may naturally be expected and that's Washington

The hotel in which we live is a long row of small houses fronting on the street, and opening at the back upon a common yard, in which hangs a great triangle Whenever a servant is wanted, somebody beats on this triangle from one stroke up to seven, according to the number of the house in which his presence is required, and as all the servants are always being wanted, and none of them ever come, this enlivening engine is in full performance the whole day through Clothes are drying in this same yard, female slaves, with cotton handkerchiefs twisted round their heads, are running to and fro on the hotel business, black waiters cross and recross with dishes in their hands, two great dogs are playing upon a mound of loose bricks in the centre of the little square, a pig is turning up his stomach to the sun, and grunting "that's comfortable", and neither the men, nor the women, nor the dogs, nor the pig, nor any created creature, takes the smallest notice of the triangle, which is tinkling madly all the time

I walk to the front window, and look across the road upon a long, straggling row of houses, one story high, terminating, nearly opposite, but a little to the left, in a melancholy piece of waste ground with frowzy grass, which looks like a small piece of country that has taken to drinking, and has quite lost itself. Standing anyhow, and all wrong, upon this open space, like something meteoric that has fallen down from the moon, is an odd, lop-sided, one-eyed kind of wooden building, that looks like a church, with a flagstaff as long as itself sticking out of a steeple something larger than a tea-chest Under the window is a small stand of coaches, whose slave-drivers are sunning themselves on the steps of our door, and talking idly together. The three most obtrusive houses near at hand are the three meanest. On one—a shop, which never has anything in the window, and never nas the door open—is painted in large characters, "The City Eunch." At another, which looks like a backway to somewhere else, but is an independent building in itself, oysters are procur able in every style. At the third, which is a very, very little tailor's shop, pants are fixed to order—or in other words, pantaloons are made to measure. And that is our street in Washington

It is sometimes called the City of Magnificent Distances, but it might with greater propriety be termed the City of Magnificent Intentions, for it is only on taking a bird's-eye view of it from the top of the Capitol that one can at all comprehend the vast designs of its projector, an aspiring Frenchman Spacious avenues, that begin in nothing, and lead nowhere, streets, mile-long, that only want houses, roads, and inhabitants, public buildings that need but a public to be complete, and ornaments of great thoroughfares, which only lack great thoroughfares to ornament—are its leading features. One might fancy the season over, and most of the houses gone out of town for ever with their masters. To the admirers of cities it is a Barmecide Feast, a pleasant field for the imagination to rove in, a monument raised to a deceased project, with not even a legible inscription to record its departed greatness.

Such as it is, it is likely to remain. It was originally chosen for the seat of Government, as a means of averting the conflicting jealousies and interests of the different States, and very probably, too, as being remote from mobs—a consideration not to be slighted, even in America. It has no trade or commerce of its own, having little or no population beyond the President and his establishment, the members of the Legislature who reside there during the session, the Government clerks and officers employed in the various departments, the keepers of the hotels and boarding-houses, and the tradesmen who supply their tables. It is very unhealthy. Few people would live in Washington, I take it, who were not obliged to reside there, and the tides of emigration and speculation, those rapid and regardless currents, are little likely to flow at any time towards such dull and sluggish water and ninety-six high, whose circular wall is divided into compartments ornamented by historical pictures. Four of these have for their subjects prominent events in the revolutionary struggle. They were painted by Colonel Trumbull, himself a member of Washington's staff at the time of their occurrence, from which circumstance they derive a peculiar interest of their own. In this same hall Mr Greenough's large statue of Washington has been lately placed. It has great merits, of course, but it struck me as being rather strained and violent for its subject. I could wish, however, to have seen it in a better light than it can ever be viewed in where it stands.

There is a very pleasant and commodious library in the Capitol, and from a balcony in front, the bird's-eye view, of which I have just spoken, may be had, together with a beautiful prospect of the adjacent country. In one of the ornamented portions of the building there is a figure of Justice, whereunto the Guide Book says, "The artist at first contemplated giving more of nudity, but he was warned that the public sentiment in this country would not admit of it, and in his caution he has gone, perhaps, into the opposite extreme." Poor Justice! she has been made to wear much stranger garments in America than those she pines in in the Capitol. Let us hope that she has changed her dressmaker since they were fashioned, and that the public sentiment of the country did not cut out the clothes she hides her lovely figure in just now.

The House of Representatives is a beautiful and spacious hall, of semicircular shape, supported by handsome pillars. One part of the gallery is appropriated to the ladies, and there they sit in front rows, and come in and go out, as at a play or concert. The chair is canopied, and raised considerably above the floor of the House, and every member has an easy-chair and a writing-desk to himself—which is denounced by some people out of doors as a most unfortunate and injudicious arrangement, tending to long sittings and prosaic speeches. It is an elegant chamber to look at, but a singularly bad one for all purposes of hearing. The Senate, which is smaller, is free from this objection, and is exceedingly well adapted to the uses for which it is designed.

The sittings, I need hardly add, take place in the day, and the parliamentary forms are modelled on those of the old country

I was sometimes asked, in my progress through other places, whether I had not been very much impressed by the heads of the law-makers at Washington—meaning not their chiefs and leaders, but literally their individual and personal heads, whereon their hair grew, and whereby the phrenological character of each legislator was expressed, and I almost as often struck my questioner dumb with indignant conster nation by answering, "No, that I didn't remember being at all overcome" As I must, at whatever hazard, repeat the avowal here, I will follow it up by relating my impressions on this subject in as few words as possible

In the first place—it may be from some imperfect development of my organ of veneration—I do not remember having ever fainted away, or having even been moved to tears of joyful pride, at sight of any legislative body I have borne the House of Commons like a man, and have yielded to no weakness, but slumber, in the House of Lords I have seen elections for borough and county, and have never been impelled (no matter which party won) to damage my hat by throwing it up into the air in triumph, or to crack my voice by shouting forth any reference to our Glorious Constitution. to the noble purity of our independent voters, or the unimpeachable integrity of our independent members Having withstood such strong attacks upon my fortitude, it is possible that I may be of a cold and insensible temperament, amounting to iciness, in such matters, and therefore my impressions of the live pillars of the Capitol at Washington must be received with such grains of allowance as this free confession may seem to demand

Did I see in this public body an assemblage of men, bound together in the sacred names of Liberty and Freedom, and so asserting the chaste dignity of those twin goddesses, in all their discussions, as to exalt at once the Eternal Principles to which their names are given, and their own character and the character of their countrymen, in the admiring eyes of the whole world?

It was but a week since an aged, grey-haired man, a lasting honour to the land that gave him birth, who has done good service to his country, as his forefathers did, and who will be remembered scores upon scores of years after the worms bred in its corruption are but so many grains of dust -it was but a week since this old man had stood for days upon his trial before this very body, charged with having dared to assert the infamy of that traffic which has for its accursed merchandise men and women, and their unborn children Yes And publicly exhibited in the same city all the while-gilded, framed, and glazed, hung up for general admiration, shown to strangers not with shame, but pride, its face not turned towards the wall, itself not taken down and burned—is the Unanimous Declaration of the Thirteen United States of America, which solemnly declares that All Men are created Equal, and are endowed by their Creator with the Inalienable Rights of Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness!

It was not a month since this same body had sat calmly by, and heard a man, one of themselves, with oaths which beggars in their drink reject, threaten to cut another's throat from ear to ear There he sat, among them, not crushed by the general feeling of the assembly, but as good a man as any

There was but a week to come, and another of that body, for doing his duty to those who sent him there-for claiming in a Republic the Liberty and Freedom of expressing their sentiments, and making known their prayer-would be tried. found guilty, and have strong censure passed upon him by the rest. His was a grave offence indeed, for years before, he had risen up and said, "A gang of male and female slaves for sale, warranted to breed like cattle, linked to each other by iron fetters, are passing now along the open street beneath the windows of your Temple of Equality Look 1" But there are many kinds of hunters engaged in the Pursuit of Happiness, and they go variously armed It is the Inalienable Right of some among them to take the field after their Happiness equipped with cat and cartwhip, stocks, and iron collar, and to shout their view halloa! (always in praise of Liberty) to the music of clanking chains and bloody stripes.

Where sat the many legislators of coarse threats—of words and blows such as coalheavers deal upon each other, when they forget their breeding? On every side Every session had its anecdotes of that kind, and the actors were all there

Did I recognize in this assembly a body of men, who, applying themselves in a new world to correct some of the falsehoods and vices of the old, purified the avenues to Public Life, paved the dirty ways to Place and Power, debated and made laws for the Common Good, and had no party but their Country?

I saw in them the wheels that move the meanest perversion of virtuous Political Machinery that the worst tools ever wrought. Despicable trickery at elections, under-handed tamperings with public officers, cowardly attacks upon opponents, with scurrilous newspapers for shields, and hired pens for daggers, shameful trucklings to mercenary knaves, whose claim to be considered is, that every day and week they sow new crops of ruin with their venal types, which are the dragon's teeth of yore, in everything but sharpness, aidings and abettings of every bad inclination in the popular mind, and artful suppressions of all its good influences such things as these, and, in a word, Dishonest Faction in its most depraved and most unblushing form, stared out from every corner of the crowded hall

Did I see among them the intelligence and refinement, the true, honest, patriotic heart of America? Here and there were drops of its blood and life, but they scarcely coloured the stream of desperate adventurers which sets that way for profit and for pay. It is the game of these men, and of their profligate organs, to make the strife of politics so fierce and brutal, and so destructive of all self-respect in worthy men, that sensitive and delicate minded persons shall be kept aloof, and they, and such as they, be left to battle out their selfish views unchecked. And thus this lowest of all scrambling fights goes on, and they who in other countries would, from their intelligence and station, most aspire to make the laws, do here recoil the farthest from that degradation

That there are, among the representatives of the people in both Houses, and among all parties, some men of high character and great abilities I need not say The foremost among those politicians who are known in Europe have been already described, and I see no reason to depart from the rule I have laid down for my guidance, of abstaining from all mention of individuals. It will be sufficient to add, that to the most favourable accounts that have been written of them, I more than fully and most heartly subscribe, and that personal intercourse and free communication have bred within me, not the result predicted in the very doubtful proverb, but increased admiration and respect. They are striking men to look at, hard to deceive, prompt to act, lions in energy, Crichtons in varied accomplishments, Indians in fire of eye and gesture, Americans in strong and generous impulse, and they as well represent the honour and wisdom of their country at home, as the distinguished gentleman who is now its Minister at the British Court sustains its highest character abroad.

I visited both Houses nearly every day during my stay in Washington. On my initiatory visit to the House of Representatives, they divided against a decision of the chair, but the chair won. The second time I went, the member who was speaking, being interrupted by a laugh, mimicked it, as one child would in quarrelling with another, and added "that he would make honourable gentlemen opposite sing out a little more on the other side of their mouths presently" But interruptions are rare, the speaker being usually heard in silence. There are more quarrels than with us, and more threatenings than gentlemen are accustomed to exchange in any civilized society of which we have record, but farmyard imitations have not as yet been imported from the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The feature in oratory which appears to be the most practised, and most relished, is the constant repetition of the same idea or shadow of an idea in fresh words, and the inquiry out of doors is not, "What did he say?" but, "How long did he speak?" These, however, are but enlargements of a principle which prevails elsewhere.

The Senate is a dignified and decorous body, and its proceedings are conducted with much gravity and order Both Houses are handsomely carpeted, but the state to which these carpets are reduced by the universal disregard of the sputtoon with which every honourable member is accommodated, and the extraordinary improvements on the pattern which are squirted and dabbled upon it in every direction, do not admit of being described. I will merely observe, that I strongly recommend all strangers not to look at the floor, and if they happen to drop anything, though it be their purse, not to pick it up with an ungloved hand on any account.

It is somewhat remarkable too, at first, to say the least, to see so many honourable members with swelled faces, and it is scarcely less remarkable to discover that this appearance is caused by the quantity of tobacco they contrive to stow within the hollow of the cheek. It is strange enough, too, to see an honourable gentleman leaning back in his tilted chair with his legs on the desk before him, shaping a convenient "plug" with his penknife, and when it is quite ready for use, shooting the old one from his mouth, as from a pop gun, and clapping the new one in its place

I was surprised to observe that even steady old chewers of great experience are not always good marksmen, which has rather inclined me to doubt that general proficiency with the rifle of which we have heard so much in England Several gentlemen called upon me who, in the course of conversation, frequently missed the spittoon at five paces, and one (but he was certainly short-sighted) mistook the closed sash for the open window, at three On another occasion, when I dined out, and was sitting with two ladies and some gen tlemen round a fire before dinner, one of the company fell short of the fireplace six distinct times I am disposed to think, however, that this was occasioned by his not aiming at that object, as there was a white marble hearth before the fender, which was more convenient, and may have suited his purpose better

The Patent Office at Washington furnishes an extraor dinary example of American enterprise and ingenuity, for the immense number of models it contains are the accumulated inventions of only five years, the whole of the previous collection having been destroyed by fire. The elegant structure in which they are arranged is one of design rather than execution, for there is but one side erected out of four, though the works are stopped. The Post Office is a very

In one of the departments, among a collection of rare and curious articles, are deposited the presents which have been made from time to time to the American ambassadors at foreign courts by the various potentates to whom they were the accredited agents of the Republic-gifts which by the law they are not permitted to retain I confess that I looked upon this as a very painful exhibition, and one by no means flattering to the national standard of honesty and honour scarcely be a high state of moral feeling which imagines a gentleman of repute and station likely to be corrupted, in the discharge of his duty, by the present of a snuff box, or a richly-mounted sword, or an Eastern shawl, and surely the nation who reposes confidence in her appointed servants is likely to be better served, than she who makes them the subject of such very mean and paltry suspicions

At George Town, in the suburbs, there is a Jesuit College, delightfully situated, and, so far as I had an opportunity of seeing, well managed. Many persons who are not members of the Romish Church avail themselves, I believe, of these institutions, and of the advantageous opportunities they afford for the education of their children. The heights in this neighbourhood, above the Potomac River, are very picturesque, and are free, I should conceive, from some of the insalubrities of Washington. The air, at that elevation, was quite cool and refreshing, when in the city it was burning

The President's mansion is more like an English club-house, both within and without, than any other kind of establishment with which I can compare it. The ornamental ground about it has been laid out in garden walks. They are pretty, and agreeable to the eye, though they have that uncomfortable air of having been made yesterday, which is far from favourable to the display of such beauties.

My first visit to this house was on the morning after my arrival, when I was carried thither by an official gentleman, who was so kind as to charge himself with my presentation to the President

We entered a large hall, and having twice or thrice rung a bell which nobody answered, walked without further ceremony through the rooms on the ground-floor, as divers other gentlemen (mostly with their hats on, and their hands in their pockets) were doing very leisurely Some of these had ladies with them, to whom they were showing the premises, others were lounging on the chairs and sofas, others, in a perfect state of exhaustion from listlessness, were vawning drearily The greater portion of this assemblage were rather asserting their supremacy than doing anything else, as they had no particular business there that anybody knew of few were closely eyeing the movables, as if to make quite sure that the President (who was far from popular) had not made away with any of the furniture, or sold the fixtures for his private benefit

After glancing at these loungers—who were scattered over a pretty drawing-room, opening upon a terrace which com manded a beautiful prospect of the river and the adjacent country, and who were sauntering, too, about a larger stateroom called the Eastern Drawing-room-we went upstairs into another chamber, where were certain visitors, waiting for audiences At sight of my conductor, a black in plain clothes and yellow slippers who was gliding noiselessly about, and whispering messages in the ears of the more impatient. made a sign of recognition, and glided off to announce him

We had previously looked into another chamber fitted all round with a great bare wooden desk or counter, whereon lay files of newspapers, to which sundry gentlemen were referring But there were no such means of beguiling the time in this apartment, which was as unpromising and tiresome as any waiting-room in one of our public establishments, or any physician's dining-room during his hours of consultation at home

There were some fifteen or twenty persons in the room One, a tall, wiry, muscular old man, from the west, sunburnt and swarthy, with a brown white hat on his knees, and a giant umbrella resting between his legs, who sat bolt upright in his chair, frowning steadily at the carpet, and twitching the hard lines about his mouth, as if he had made up his mind "to fix" the President on what he had to say, and wouldn't bate him a grain Another, a Kentucky farmer, six-feet-six in height, with his hat on, and his hands under his coat-tails.

who leaned against the wall and kicked the floor with his heel, as though he had Time's head under his shoe, and were literally "killing" him. A third, an oval-faced, bilious-looking man, with sleek black hair cropped close, and whiskers and beard shaved down to blue dots, who sucked the head of a thick stick, and from time to time took it out of his mouth to see how it was getting on. A fourth did nothing but whistle. A fifth did nothing but spit. And indeed all these gentlemen were so very persevering and energetic in this latter particular, and bestowed their favours so abundantly upon the carpet, that I take it for granted the Presidential housemaids have high wages, or, to speak more genteelly, an ample amount of "compensation"—which is the American word for salary, in the case of all public servants

We had not waited in this room many minutes before the black messenger returned, and conducted us into another of smaller dimensions, where, at a businesslike table covered with papers, sat the President himself He looked somewhat worn and anxious—and well he might, being at war with everybody—but the expression of his face was mild and pleasant, and his manner was remarkably unaffected, gentlemanly, and agreeable I thought that, in his whole carriage and demeanour, he became his station singularly well

Being advised that the sensible etiquette of the republican court admitted of a traveller, like myself, declining, without any impropriety, an invitation to dinner, which did not reach me until I had concluded my arrangements for leaving Washington some days before that to which it referred, I only returned to this house once—It was on the occasion of one of those general assemblies which are held on certain nights, between the hours of nine and twelve o'clock, and are called, rather oddly, Levees

I went, with my wife, at about ten There was a pretty dense crowd of carnages and people in the courtyard, and, so far as I could make out, there were no very clear regulations for the taking up or setting down of company There were certainly no policemen to soothe startled horses, either by sawing at their bridles or flourishing truncheons in their eyes, and I am ready to make oath that no inoffensive persons were knocked violently on the head, or poked acutely in their backs or stomachs, or brought to a standstill by any such gentle means, and then taken into custody for not moving on But there was no confusion or disorder Our carriage reached the porch in its turn, without any blustering, swearing, shouting, backing, or other disturbance, and we dismounted with as much ease and comfort as though we had been escorted by the whole Metropolitan Force from A to Z inclusive

The suite of rooms on the ground-floor were lighted up, and a military band was playing in the hall In the smaller drawing room, the centre of a circle of company, were the President and his daughter-in-law, who acted as the lady of the mansion, and a very interesting, graceful, and accomplished lady too One gentleman who stood among this group appeared to take upon himself the functions of a master of the ceremonies I saw no other officers or attendants, and none were needed

The great drawing room, which I have already mentioned, and the other chambers on the ground-floor, were crowded The company was not, in our sense of the term, select, for it comprehended persons of very many grades and classes, nor was there any great display of costly attireindeed some of the costumes may have been, for aught I know, grotesque enough But the decorum and propriety of behaviour which prevailed, were unbroken by any rude or disagreeable incident, and every man, even among the miscellaneous crowd in the hall who were admitted without any orders or tickets to look on, appeared to feel that he was a part of the Institution, and was responsible for its preserving a becoming character, and appearing to the best advantage

That these visitors, too, whatever their station, were not without some refinement of taste and appreciation of intellectual gifts, and gratitude to those men who, by the peaceful exercise of great abilities, shed new charms and associations upon the homes of their countrymen, and elevate their character in other lands, was most earnestly testified by their reception of Washington Irving, my dear friend, who had recently been appointed Minister at the Court of Spain, and who was among them that night, in his new character, for the first and last time before going abroad I sincerely believe that in all the madness of American politics, few public men would have been so earnestly, devotedly, and affectionately caressed as this most charming writer, and I have seldon respected a public assembly more than I did this eager throng, when I saw them turning with one mind from noisy orators and officers of state, and flocking with a generous and honest impulse round the man of quiet pursuits—proud in his promotion as reflecting back upon their country, and grateful to him with their whole hearts for the store of graceful fancies he had poured out among them Long may he dispense such treasures with unsparing hand, and long may they remember him as worthily!

The term we had assigned for the duration of our stay in Washington was now at an end, and we were to begin to travel, for the railroad distances we had traversed yet, in journeying among these older towns, are on that great continent looked upon as nothing

I had at first intended going South—to Charleston But when I came to consider the length of time which this journey would occupy, and the premature heat of the season, which even at Washington had been often very trying, and weighed moreover, in my own mind, the pain of living in the constant contemplation of slavery, against the more than doubtful chances of my ever seeing it, in the time I had to spare, stripped of the disguises in which it would certainly be dressed, and so adding any item to the host of facts already heaped together on the subject, I began to listen to old whisperings which had often been present to me at home in England, when I little thought of ever being here, and to dream again of cities growing up, like palaces in fairy tales, among the wilds and forests of the west

The advice I received in most quarters when I began to yield to my desire of travelling towards that point of the compass was, according to custom, sufficiently cheerless my companion being threatened with more perils, dangers, and discomforts, than I can remember or would catalogue if I could, but of which it will be sufficient to remark that blowings-up in steamboats and breakings-down in coaches were among the least But, having a western route sketched out for me by the best and kindest authority to which I could have resorted, and putting no great faith in these discourage ments, I soon determined on my plan of action

This was to travel south, only to Richmond in Virginia, and then to turn, and shape our course for the Far West whither I beseech the reader's company, in a new chapter

A NIGHT STEAMER ON THE POTOMAC RIVER VIRGINIA ROAD. AND A BLACK DRIVER RICHMOND BALTIMORE HARRISBURG MAIL. AND A GLIMPSE OF THE CITY CANAL BOAT

WE were to proceed in the first instance by steamboat, and as it is usual to sleep on board, in consequence of the starting hour being four o'clock in the morning, we went down to where she lay, at that very uncomfortable time for such expeditions when slippers are most valuable, and a familiar bed, in the perspective of an hour or two, looks uncommonly pleasant

It is ten o'clock at night—say half-past ten—moonlight, warm, and dull enough The steamer (not unlike a child's Noah's ark in form, with the machinery on the top of the roof) is riding lazily up and down, and bumping clumsily against the wooden pier, as the ripple of the river trifles with its unwieldy carcass. The wharf is some distance from the city There is nobody down here, and one or two dull lamps upon the steamer's decks are the only signs of life remaining when our coach has driven away As soon as our footsteps are heard upon the planks, a fat negress, particularly favoured by nature in respect of bustle, emerges from some dark stairs, and marshals my wife towards the ladies' cabin, to which retreat she goes, followed by a mighty bale of cloaks and greatcoats I valiantly resolve not to go to bed at all, but to walk up and down the pier till morning

down for half an hour Then I go on board again, and getting into the light of one of the lamps, look at my watch and think it must have stopped, and wonder what has become of the faithful secretary whom I brought along with me from Boston He is supping with our late landlord (a Field Marshal, at least, no doubt) in honour of our departure, and may be two hours longer I walk again, but it gets duller and duller the moon goes down next June seems farther off in the dark, and the echoes of my footsteps make me nervous It has turned cold too, and walking up and down without any companion, in such lonely circumstances, is but poor amusement So I break my stanch resolution, and think it may be, perhaps, as well to go to bed

I go on board again, open the door of the gentlemen's cabin, and walk in Somehow or other-from its being so quiet, I suppose-I have taken it into my head that there is nobody there To my horror and amazement it is full of sleepers in every stage, shape, attitude, and variety of slumber-in the berths, on the chairs, on the floors, on the tables, and particularly round the stove, my detested enemy I take another step forward, and slip upon the shining face of a black steward, who lies rolled in a blanket on the floor He jumps up, grins, half in pain and half in hospitality, whispers my own name in my ear, and groping among the sleepers, leads me to my berth Standing beside it, I count these slumbering passengers, and get past forty There is no use in going further, so I begin to undress As the chairs are all occupied, and there is nothing else to put my clothes on, I deposit them upon the ground-not without soiling my hands, for it is in the same condition as the carpets in the Capitol, and from the same cause Having but partially undressed, I clamber on my shelf, and hold the curtain open for a few minutes while-I look round on all my fellow travellers again That done, I let it fall on them, and on the

I wake, of course, when we get under weigh, for there is a good deal of noise. The day is then just breaking. Every body wakes at the same time. Some are self-possessed directly, and some are much perplexed to make out where they are until they have rubbed their eyes, and, leaning or one elbow, looked about them Some yawn, some groan, nearly all spit, and a few get up I am among the risers, for it is easy to feel, without going into the fresh air, that the atmosphere of the cabin is vile in the last degree I huddle on my clothes, go down into the fore cabin, get shaved by the barber, and wash myself The washing and dressing apparatus for the passengers generally, consists of two jacktowels, three small wooden basins, a keg of water and a ladle to serve it out with, six square inches of looking-glass, two ditto ditto of yellow soap, a comb and brush for the head, and nothing for the teeth Everybody uses the comb and own, and two or three gentlemen are strongly disposed to banter me on my prejudices, but don't When I have made my toilet I go upon the hurricane deck, and set in for two hours of hard walking up and down The sun is rising brilliantly, we are passing Mount Vernon, where Washington lies buried, the river is wide and rapid, and its banks are beautiful All the glory and splendour of the day are coming on, and growing brighter every minute

At eight o'clock we breakfast in the cabin where I passed the night, but the windows and doors are all thrown open, and now it is fresh enough. There is no hurry or greediness apparent in the dispatch of the meal. It is longer than a travelling breakfast with us, more orderly, and more polite.

Soon after nine ciclock we come to Potomac Creek, where we are to land, and then comes the oddest part of the journey Seven stage-coaches are preparing to carry us on Some of them are ready, some of them are not ready. Some of the drivers are blacks, some whites. There are four horses to each coach, and all the horses, harnessed or unharnessed, are there. The passengers are getting out of the steamboat, and into the coaches, the luggage is being transferred in noisy wheelbarrows, the horses are frightened, and impatient to start, the black drivers are chattering to them like so many monkeys, and the white ones whooping like so many drovers—for the main thing to be done in all kinds of hostlering here is to make as much noise as possible. The coaches are something like the French coaches, but not nearly so good. In lieu of springs, they are hung on bands of the strongest leather There is very little choice or difference between them, and they may be likened to the car portion of the swings at an English fair, roofed, put upon axle-trees and wheels, and curtained with painted canvas. They are covered with mud from the roof to the wheel-tyre, and have never been cleaned since they were first built

The tickets we have received on board the steamboat are marked No I, so we belong to coach No I I throw my coat on the box, and hoist my wife and her maid into the inside. It has only one step, and that being about a yard from the ground, is usually approached by a chair, when there is no chair, ladies trust in Providence. The coach holds nine inside, having a seat across from door to door, where we in England put our legs, so that there is only one feat more difficult in the performance than getting in, and that is, getting out again. There is only one outside passenger, and he sits upon the box. As I am that one, I climb up, and while they are strapping the luggage on the roof, and heaping it into a kind of tray behind, have a good opportunity of looking at the driver.

He is a negro—very black indeed. He is dressed in a coarse pepper and-salt suit excessively patched and darned (particularly at the knees), grey stockings, enormous unblacked high-low shoes, and very short trousers. He has two odd gloves—one of parti-coloured worsted, and one of leather. He has a very short whip, broken in the middle and bandaged up with string. And yet he wears a low-crowned, broad brimmed, black hat, faintly shadowing forth a kind of insane imitation of an English coachman! But somebody in authority cries "Go ahead!" as I am making these observa-

all the coaches follow in procession, headed by No i By the way, whenever an Englishman would cry "All right!" an American cries "Go ahead!" which is somewhat expressive of the national character of the two countries

tions The mail takes the lead in a four-horse wagon, and

The first half-mile of the road is over bridges made of loose planks laid across two parallel poles, which tilt up as the wheels roll over them, and in the river The fiver has a clayey bottom and is full of holes, so that half a horse is constantly disappearing unexpectedly, and can't be found again for some time

But we get past even this, and come to the road itself, which is a series of alternate swamps and gravel-pits tremendous place is close before us the black driver rolls his eyes, screws his mouth up very round, and looks straight between the two leaders, as if he were saying to himself, "We have done this often before, but now I think we shall have a crash" He takes a rein in each hand, jerks and pulls at both, and dances on the splashboard with both feet (keeping his seat, of course) like the late lamented Ducrow on two of his fiery coursers We come to the spot, sink down in the mire nearly to the coach windows, tilt on one side at an angle of forty-five degrees, and stick there insides scream dismally, the coach stops, the horses flounder, all the other six coaches stop, and their four-and-twenty horses flounder likewise but merely for company, and in sympathy with ours Then the following circumstances occur

BLACK DRIVER (to the horses) "H1!" Nothing happens Insides scream again BLACK DRIVER (to the horses) "Ho!" Horses plunge, and splash the black driver

GENTLEMAN INSIDE (looking out) "Why, what on airth---"

Gentleman receives a variety of splashes, and draws his head in again, without finishing his question or waiting for an answer

BLACK DRIVER (still to the horses) "Jiddy!"

Horses pull violently, drag the coach out of the hole, and draw it up a bank, so steep, that the black driver's legs fly up into the air, and he goes back among the luggage on the roof But he immediately recovers himself, and cries (still to the horses),---" Pıll ! "

No effect On the contrary, the coach begins to roll back upon No 2, which rolls back upon No 3, which rolls back upon No 4, and so on, until No 7 is heard to curse and swear, nearly a quarter of a mile behind

Horses make another struggle to get up the bank, and again the coach rolls backward

BLACK DRIVER (louder than before) "Pe e-e-ill!"

BLACK DRIVER (recovering spirits) "HI, Jiddy, Jiddy, Pill!"

Horses almost do 1t

They run up the bank, and go down again on the other side at a fearful pace It is impossible to stop them, and at the bottom there is a deep hollow, full of water The coach rolls frightfully The insides scream The mud and water fly about us The black driver dances like a madman. Suddenly we are all right by some extraordinary means, and stop to breathe

A black friend of the black driver is sitting on a fence The black driver recognizes him by twirling his head round and round like a harlequin, rolling his eyes, shrugging his shoulders, and grinning from ear to ear He stops short, turns to me, and says,—

"We shall get you through, sa, like a fiddle, and hope a please you when we get you through, sa Old 'coman at home, sa "chuckling very much "Outside gentleman, sa, he often remember old 'ooman at home, sa," grinning again

"Ay, ay, we'll take care of the old woman Don't be afraid "

The black driver grins again, but there is another hole, and beyond that another bank, close before us. So he stops short, cries (to the horses again), "Easy Easy den Ease. Steady Hi. Jiddy Pill Ally Loo," but never "Lee!" until we are reduced to the very last extremity, and are in the midst of difficulties, extrication from which appears to be all but impossible many, and, in short, getting through the distance "like a fiddle"

This singular kind of coaching terminates at Fredericksburg, whence there is a railway to Richmond. The tract of country through which it takes its course was once productive, but the soil has been exhausted by the system of employing a great amount of slave labour in forcing crops without strengthening the land, and it is now little better than a sandy desert overgrown with trees. Dreary and uninteresting as its aspect is, I was glad to the heart to find anything on which one of the curses of this horrible institution has fallen, and had greater pleasure in contemplating the withered ground, than the richest and most thriving cultivation in the same place could possibly have afforded me

In this district, as in all others where slavery sits brooding (I have frequently heard this admitted, even by those who are its warmest advocates), there is an air of ruin and decay abroad which is inseparable from the system. The barns and outhouses are mouldering away, the sheds are patched and half roofless, the log cabins (built in Virginia with external chimneys made of clay or wood) are squalid in the last degree. There is no look of decent comfort anywhere. The miserable stations by the railway side, the great wild woodyards, whence the engine is supplied with fuel, the negro children rolling on the ground before the cabin doors, with dogs and pigs, the biped beasts of burden slinking past gloom and dejection are upon them all

In the negro car belonging to the train in which we made this journey were a mother and her children who had just been purchased, the husband and father being left behind with their old owner. The children cried the whole way, and the mother was misery's picture. The champion of Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness, who had bought them, rode in the same train, and every time we stopped, got down to see that they were safe. The black in Sindbad's Travels with one eye in the middle of his forehead which shone like a burning coal, was nature's aristocrat compared with this white gentleman.

It was between six and seven o'clock in the evening when we drove to the hotel, in front of which, and on the top of the broad flight of steps leading to the door, two or three citizens were balancing themselves on rocking-chairs, and smoking cigars. We found it a very large and elegant estab lishment, and were as well entertained as travellers need desire to be. The climate being a thirsty one, there was never, at any hour of the day, a scarcity of loungers in the spacious bar, or a cessation of the mixing of cool liquors, but they were a merrier people here, and had musical instruments playing to them o' nights, which it was a treat to hear again

The next day, and the next, we rode and walked about the town, which is delightfully situated on eight hills overhanging James River—a sparkling stream, studded here and there with bright islands, or brawling over broken rocks. Although it was yet but the middle of March, the weather in this southern temperature was extremely warm, the peach-trees and magnolias were in full bloom, and the trees were green. In a low ground among the hills is a valley known as "Bloody Run," from a terrible conflict with the Indians which once occurred there. It is a good place for such a struggle, and, like every other spot I saw associated with any legend of that wild people now so rapidly fading from the earth, interested me very much

The city is the seat of the local parliament of Virginia, and in its shady legislative halls some orators were drowsily holding forth to the hot noonday. By dint of constant repetition, however, these constitutional sights had very little more interest for me than so many parochial vestries, and I was glad to exchange this one for a lounge in a well-arranged public library of some ten thousand volumes, and a visit to a tobacco manufactory, where the workmen were all slaves

I saw in this place the whole process of picking, rolling, pressing, drying, packing in casks, and branding. All the tobacco thus dealt with was in course of manufacture for chewing and one would have supposed there was enough in that one storehouse to have filled even the comprehensive jaws of America. In this form the weed looks like the oil-cake on which we fatten cattle, and even without reference to its consequences, is sufficiently uninviting.

Many of the workmen appeared to be strong men, and it is hardly necessary to add that they were all labouring quietly then. After two o'clock in the day they are allowed to sing, a certain number at a time. The hour striking while I was there, some twenty sang a hymn in parts, and sang it by no means ill, pursuing their work meanwhile. A bell rang as I was about to leave, and they all poured forth into a building on the opposite side of the street to dinner. I said several times that I should like to see them at their meal, but as the gentleman to whom I mentioned this desire appeared to be suddenly taken rather deaf, I did not pursue the request. Of their appearance I shall have something to say presently

On the following day I visited a plantation or farm, of about twelve hundred acres, on the opposite bank of the river. Here again, although I went down with the owner of the estate to the "quarter," as that part of it in which the slaves live is called, I was not invited to enter into any of their huts. All I saw of them was that they were very crazy, wretched cabins, near to which groups of half naked children basked in the sun or wallowed on the dusty ground. But I believe that this gentleman is a considerate and excellent master, who inherited his fifty slaves, and is neither a buyer nor a seller of human stock, and I am sure, from my own observation and conviction, that he is a kind-hearted, worthy man.

The planter's house was an airy rustic dwelling, that brought Defoe's description of such places strongly to my The day was very warm, but the blinds being recollection all closed, and the windows and doors set wide open, a shady coolness rustled through the rooms, which was exquisitely refreshing after the glare and heat without Before the windows was an open piazza, where, in what they call the hot weather-whatever that may be-they sling hammocks, and doze luxuriously I do not know how their cool refections may taste within the hammocks, but, having experience, I can report that, out of them, the mounds of ices and the bowls of mint-julep and sherry-cobbler they make in these latitudes are refreshments never to be thought of afterwards. in summer, by those who would preserve contented minds. There are two bridges across the river One belongs to the railroad, and the other, which is a very crazy affair, is the private property of some old lady in the neighbourhood, who levies tolls upon the townspeople. Crossing this bridge, on my way back, I saw a notice painted on the gate, cautioning all persons to drive slowly, under a penalty, if the offender were a white man, of five dollars, if a negro, fifteen stripes

The same decay and gloom that overhang the way by which it is approached, hover above the town of Richmond. There are pretty villas and cheerful houses in its streets, and Nature smiles upon the country round, but jostling its handsome residences, like slavery itself going hand in hand with many lofty virtues, are deplorable tenements, fences unrepaired, walls crumbling into ruinous heaps. Hinting gloomily at things below the surface, these, and many other tokens of the same description, force themselves upon the notice, and are remembered with depressing influence when

To those who are happily unaccustomed to them, the countenances in the streets and labouring-places, too, are shocking. All men who know that there are laws against instructing slaves, of which the pains and penalties greatly exceed in their amount the fines imposed on those who main and torture them, must be prepared to find their faces very low in the scale of intellectual expression. But the darkness—not of skin, but mind—which meets the stranger's eye at every turn, the brutalizing and blotting out of all fairer characters traced by Nature's hand, immeasurably outdo his worst belief. That travelled creation of the great satirist's brain, who, fresh from living among horses, peered from a high casement down upon his own kind with trembling horror, was scarcely more repelled and daunted by the sight than those who look, upon some of these faces for the first time must surely be

I left the last of them behind me in the person of a wretched drudge, who, after running to and fro all day till midnight, and moping in his stealthy winks of sleep upon the stairs betweenwhiles, was washing the dark passages at four o'clock in the morning, and went upon my way with a grateful heart that I was not doomed to live where slavery was, and had never had my senses blunted to its wrongs and horrors in a slave rocked cradle

It had been my intention to proceed by James River and Chesapeake Bay to Baltimore, but one of the steamboats being absent from her station through some accident, and the means of conveyance being consequently rendered uncertain, we returned to Washington by the way we had come (there were two constables on board the steamboat, in pursuit of runaway slaves), and halting there again for one night, went on to Baltimore next afternoon

The most comfortable of all the hotels of which I had any experience in the United States, and they were not a few, is Barnum's, in that city, where the English traveller will find curtains to his bed, for the first and probably the last time in America (this is a disinterested remark, for I never use them), and where he will be likely to have enough water for washing himself, which is not at all a common case

This capital of the State of Maryland is a bustling busy town, with a great deal of traffic of various kinds, and in particular of water commerce. That portion of the town which it most favours is none of the cleanest, it is true, but the upper part is of a very different character, and has many agreeable streets and public buildings. The Washington Monument, which is a handsome pillar with a statue on its summit, the Medical College, and the Battle Monument in memory of an engagement with the British at North Point, are the most conspicuous among them

There is a very good prison in this city, and the State Penitentiary is also among its institutions. In this latter establishment there were two curious cases

One was that of a young man, who had been tried for the murder of his father. The evidence was entirely circumstantial, and was very conflicting and doubtful, nor was it possible to assign any motive which could have tempted him to the commission of so tremendous a crime. He had been tried twice, and on the second occasion the jury felt so much hestitation in convicting him, that they found a verdict of manslaughter, or murder in the second degree—which it could not possibly be, as there had, beyond all doubt, been no quarrel or provocation, and if he were guilty at all, he was unquestionably guilty of murder in its broadest and worst

The remarkable feature in the case was, that if the unfortunate deceased were not really murdered by this own son of his, he must have been murdered by his own brother. The evidence lay, in a most remarkable manner, between those two. On all the suspicious points, the dead man's brother was the witness, all the explanations for the prisoner (some of them extremely plausible) went, by construction and inference, to inculpate him as plotting to fix the guilt upon his nephew. It must have been one of them, and the jury had to decide between two sets of suspicions, almost equally unnatural, unaccountable, and strange

The other case was that of a man who once went to a certain distiller's and stole a copper measure containing a quantity of liquor He was pursued and taken with the property in his possession, and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment On coming out of the jail, at the expiration of that term, he went back to the same distiller's, and stole the same copper measure containing the same quantity of liquor There was not the slightest reason to suppose that the man wished to return to prison, indeed, everything but the commission of the offence made directly against that assumption There are only two ways of accounting for this extraordinary proceeding One is, that after undergoing so much for this copper measure, he conceived he had established a sort of claim and right to it. The other, that, by dint of long thinking about it, it had become a monomania with him, and had acquired a fascination which he found it impossible to resist—swelling from an Earthly Copper Gallon into an Ethereal Golden Vat

After remaining here a couple of days, I bound myself to a rigid adherence to the plan I had laid down so recently, and resolved to set forward on our western journey without any more delay — Accordingly, having reduced the luggage within the smallest possible compass (by sending back to New York, to be afterwards forwarded to us in Canada, so much of it as was not absolutely wanted), and having procured the necessary credentials to banking houses on the way, and having, moreover, looked for two evenings at the setting sun, with as well-defined an idea of the country before us as if we had been going to travel into the very centre of that planet, we left Baltimore by another railway at half past eight in the morning, and reached the town of York, some sixty miles off, by the early dinner-time of the hotel which was the starting-place of the four-horse coach wherein we were to proceed to Harrisburg

This conveyance, the box of which I was fortunate enough to secure, had come down to meet us at the railroad station, and was as muddy and cumbersome as usual. As more passengers were waiting for us at the inn door, the coachman observed under his breath, in the usual self-communicative voice, looking the while at his mouldy harness as if it were to that he was addressing himself.—

"I expect we shall want the big coach"

I could not help wondering within myself what the size of this big coach might be, and how many persons it might be designed to hold, for the vehicle which was too small for our purpose was something larger than two English heavy night coaches, and might have been the twin-brother of a French diligence. My speculations were speedily set at rest, however, for as soon as we had dined, there came rumbling up the street, shaking its sides like a corpulent giant, a kind of barge on wheels. After much blundering and backing, it stopped at the door—rolling heavily from side to side when its other motion had ceased, as if it had taken cold in its damp stable, and between that, and the having been required in its dropsical old age to move at any faster pace than a walk, were distressed by shortness of wind

"If here ain't the Harnsburg mail at last, and dreadful bright and smart to look at too," cried an elderly gentleman in some excitement, "darn my mother!"

I don't know what the sensation of being darned may be, or whether a man's mother has a keener relish or disrelish of the process than anybody else, but if the endurance of this mysterious ceremony by the old lady in question had depended on the accuracy of her son's vision in respect to the abstract brightness and smartness of the Harrisburg mail, she would certainly have undergone its infliction. However, they booked twelve people inside, and the luggage (include ing such trifles as a large rocking-chair and a good-sized dining-table) being at length made fast upon the roof, we started off in great state

At the door of another hotel there was another passenger to be taken up

"Any room, sir?" cries the new passenger to the coachman

"Well, there's room enough," replies the coachman, with out getting down, or even looking at him

"There an't no room at all, str," bawls a gentleman inside Which another gentleman (also inside) confirms, by predicting that the attempt to introduce any more passengers "won't fit nohow"

The new passenger, without any expression of anxiety, looks into the coach, and then looks up at the coachman "Now, how do you mean to fix it?" says he, after a pause,

"for I must go"

The coachman employs himself in twisting the lash of his whip into a knot, and takes no more notice of the question, clearly signifying that it is anybody's business but his, and that the passengers would do well to fix it among themselves. In this state of things, matters seem to be approximating to a fix of another kind, when another inside passenger in a corner, who is nearly suffocated, cries faintly, "I'll get out"

This is no matter of relief or self-congratulation to the driver, for his immovable philosophy is perfectly undisturbed by anything that happens in the coach. Of all things in the world, the coach would seem to be the very last upon his mind. The exchange is made, however, and then the passenger who has given up his seat makes a third upon the box, seating himself in what he calls the middle—that is, with half his person-on my legs, and the other half on the driver's

"Go ahead, cap'en," cries the colonel, who directs

"Gŏ-lāng!" cries the cap'en to his company, the horses, and away we go

We took up at a rural bar-room, after we had gone a few miles, an intoxicated gentleman, who climbed upon the roof among the luggage, and subsequently slipping off without hurting himself, was seen in the distant perspective reeling back to the grog shop where we had found him We also parted with more of our freight at different times, so that, when we came to change horses, I was again alone outside when we came to change horses, I was again alone outside. The coachmen always change with the horses, and are usually as dirty as the coach. The first was dressed like a very shabby English baker, the second like a Russian peasant, for he wore a loose purple camlet robe, with a fur collar, tied round his waist with a parti coloured worsted sash, grey trousers, light blue gloves, and a cap of bearskin. It had by this time come on to rain very heavily, and there was a cold damp mist besides, which penetrated to the skin. I was very glad to take advantage of a stoppage and get down to stretch my legs, shake the water off my great-coat, and swallow the usual anti-temperance recipe for keeping out the cold

When I mounted to my seat again, I observed a new parcel lying on the coach roof, which I took to be a rather large fiddle in a brown bag. In the course of a few miles, however, I discovered that it had a glazed cap at one end and a pair of muddy shoes at the other, and further observation demonstrated it to be a small boy in a snuff-coloured coat, with his arms quite pinioned to his sides by deep forcing into his pockets. He was, I presume, a relative or friend of the coachman's, as he lay atop of the luggage with his face towards the rain, and except when a change of position brought his shoes in contact with my hat, he appeared to be asleep. At last, on some occasion of our stopping, this thing slowly upreared itself to the height of three feet six, and fixing its eyes on me, observed in piping accents, with a complaisant yawn, half quenched in an obliging air of friendly patronage, "Well now, stranger, I guess you find this a'most like an English arternoon, hey?"

The scenery, which had been tame enough at first, was, for the last ten or twelve miles, beautiful Our road wound through the pleasant valley of the Susquehanna, the river, dotted with innumerable green islands, lay upon our right, and on the left, a steep ascent, craggy with broken rock, and dark with pine trees. The mist, wreathing itself into a hundred fantastic shapes, moved solemnly upon the water, and the gloom of evening gave to all an air of mystery and silence

which greatly enhanced its natural interest

We crossed this river by a wooden bridge, roofed and covered in on all sides, and nearly a mile in length. It was profoundly dark, perplexed, with great beams crossing and recrossing it at every possible angle, and through the broad chinks and crevices in the floor, the rapid river gleamed, far down below, like a legion of eyes. We had no lamps, and as the horses stumbled and floundered through this place, towards the distant speck of dying light, it seemed interminable. I really could not at first persuade myself, as we rumbled heavily on, filling the bridge with hollow noises, and I held down my head to save it from the rafters above, but that I was in a painful dream, for I have often dreamed of toiling through such places, and as often argued, even at the time, "this cannot be reality"

At length, however, we emerged upon the streets of Harrisburg, whose feeble lights, reflected dismally from the wet ground, did not shine out upon a very cheerful city. We were soon established in a snug hotel, which, though smaller and far less splendid than many we put up at, is raised above them all in my remembrance, by having for its landlord the most obliging, considerate, and gentlemanly person I ever had to deal with

As we were not to proceed upon our journey until the afternoon, I walked out, after breakfast the next morning, to look about me, and was duly shown a model prison on the solitary system, just erected, and as yet without an inmate, the trunk of an old tree to which Harris, the first settler here (afterwards buried under it), was tied by hostile Indians, with his funeral pile about him, when he was saved by the timely appearance of a friendly party on the opposite shore of the river, the local legislature (for there was another of those bodies here again, in full debate), and the other curiosities of the town

I was very much, interested in looking over a number of treaties made from time to time with the poor Indians, signed by the different chiefs at the period of their ratification, and preserved in the office of the Secretary to the Commonwealth These signatures, traced of course by their own hands, are rough drawings of the creatures or weapons they were called after Thus, the Great Turtle makes a crooked pen-and-ink outline of a great turtle, the Buffalo sketches a buffalo, the War Hatchet sets a rough image of that weapon for his mark So with the Arrow, the Fish, the Scalp, the Big Canoe, and all of them

I could not but think, as I looked at these feeble and tremulous productions of hands which could draw the longest arrow to the head in a stout elk-horn bow, or split a bead or feather with a rifle ball, of Crabbe's musings over the Parish Register, and the irregular scratches made with a pen by men who would plough a lengthy furrow straight from end to Nor could I help bestowing many sorrowful thoughts upon the simple warriors whose hands and hearts were set there, in all truth and honesty, and who only learned in course of time from white men how to break their faith, and quibble out of forms and bonds I wondered, too, how many times the credulous Big Turtle, or trusting Little Hatchet, had put his mark to treaties which were falsely read to him, and had signed away, he knew not what, until it went and cast him loose upon the new possessors of the land, a savage indeed

Our host announced, before our early dinner, that some members of the legislative body proposed to do us the honour of calling He had kindly yielded up to us his wife's own little parlour, and when I begged that he would show them in, I saw him look with painful apprehension at its pretty carpet, though, being otherwise occupied at the time, the cause of his uneasiness did not occur to me

It certainly would have been more pleasant to all parties concerned, and would not, I think, have compromised their independence in any material degree, if some of these gentle men had not only yielded to the prejudice in favour of spittoons, but had abandoned themselves, for the moment, even to the conventional absurdity of pocket-handkerchiefs

It still continued to rain heavily, and when we went down to the canal boat (for that was the mode of conveyance by which we were to proceed) after dinner, the weather was as unpromising and obstinately wet as one would desire to see Nor was the sight of this canal boat, in which we were to spend three or four days, by any means a cheerful one, as it involved some uneasy speculations concerning the disposal of the passengers at night, and opened a wide field of inquiry touching the other domestic arrangements of the establishment which was sufficiently disconcerting

However, there it was-a barge with a little house in it, viewed from the outside, and a caravan at a fair, viewed from within the gentlemen being accommodated, as the spectators usually are, in one of those locomotive museums of penny wonders, and the ladies being partitioned off by a red curtain, after the manner of the dwarfs and giants in the same establishments, whose private lives are passed in rather close exclusiveness

We sat here, looking silently at the row of little tables, which extended down both sides of the cabin, and listening to the rain as it dripped and pattered on the boat, and plashed with a dismal merriment in the water, until the arrival of the railway train, for whose final contribution to our stock of passengers our departure was alone deferred It brought a great many boxes, which were bumped and tossed upon the roof, almost as painfully as if they had been deposited on one's own head, without the intervention of a porter's knot, and several damp gentlemen, whose clothes, on their drawing round the stove, began to steam again doubt it would have been a thought more comfortable if the driving rain, which now poured down more soakingly than ever, had admitted of a window being opened, or if our number had been something less than thirty, but there was scarcely time to think as much, when a train of three horses was attached to the tow-rope, the boy upon the leader smacked his whip, the rudder creaked and groaned complainingly, and we had begun our journey

SOME FURTHER ACCOUNT OF THE CANAL BOAT, ITS DOMESTIC ECONOMY, AND ITS PASSENGERS JOURNEY TO PITTS-BURG ACROSS THE ALLEGHANY MOUNTAINS PITTS-BURG

As it continued to rain most perseveringly, we all remained below—the damp gentlemen round the stove gradually becoming mildewed by the action of the fire, and the dry gentlemen lying at full length upon the seats, or slumbering uneasily with their faces on the tables, or walking up and down the cabin, which it was barely possible for a man of the middle height to do without making bald places on his head by scraping it against the roof. At about six o'clock all the small tables were put together to form one long table, and everybody sat down to tea, coffee, bread, butter, salmon, shad, liver, steak, potatoes, pickles, ham, chops, black-puddings, and sausages

"Will you try," said my opposite neighbour, handing me a dish of potatoes broken up in milk and butter—"will you try some of these fixings?"

There are few words which perform such various duties as this word "fix" It is the Caleb Quotem of the American vocabulary. You call upon a gentleman in a country town, and his help informs you that he is "fixing himself" just now, but will be down directly, by which you are to understand that he is dressing. You inquire, on board a steamboat, of a fellow-passenger, whether breakfast will be ready soon, and he tells you he should think so, for when he was last below they were "fixing the tables," in other words, laying the cloth. You beg a porter to collect your luggage, and he entreats you not to be uneasy, for he'll "fix it presently," and if you complain of indisposition, you are advised to have recourse to Doctor So-and-so, who will "fix you" in no time

One night I ordered a bottle of mulled wine at an hotel where I was staying, and waited a long time for it, at length it was put upon the table with an apology from the landlord that he feared it wasn't "fixed properly" And I recollect once, at a stage-coach dinner, overhearing a very stern gentleman demand of a waiter who presented him with a plate of underdone roast-beef, "whether he called that fixing God A'mighty's vittles?"

There is no doubt that the meal at which the invitation was tendered to me which has occasioned this digression was disposed of somewhat ravenously, and that the gentlemen thrust the broad-bladed knives and the two pronged forks further down their throats than I ever saw the same weapons go before, except in the hands of a skilful juggler, but no man sat down until the ladies were seated, or omitted any little act of politeness which could contribute to their comfort. Nor did I ever once, on any occasion, anywhere, during my rambles in America, see a woman exposed to the slightest act of rudeness, incivility, or even inattention

By the time the meal was over, the rain, which seemed to have worn itself out by coming down so fast, was nearly over too, and it became feasible to go on deck, which was a great relief, notwithstanding its being a very small deck, and being rendered still smaller by the luggage, which was heaped together in the middle under a tarpaulin covering, leaving, on either side, a path so narrow, that it became a science to walk to and fro without tumbling overboard into the canal. It was somewhat embarrassing at first, too, to have to duck nimbly every five minutes whenever the man at the helm cried "Bridge!" and sometimes, when the cry was "Low Bridge," to be down nearly flat But custom familiarizes one to anything, and there were so many bridges that it took a very short time to get used to this

As night came on, and we drew in sight of the first range of hills, which are the outposts of the Alleghany Mountains, the scenery, which had been uninteresting hitherto, became more bold and striking. The wet ground reeked and smoked, after the heavy fall of rain, and the croaking of the frogs (whose noise in these parts is almost incredible) sounded as though a million of fairy teams with bells were travelling through the air, and keeping pace with us. The night was cloudy yet, but moonlight too, and when we crossed the Susquehanna River—over which there is an extraordinary wooden bridge with two galleries, one above the other, so that even there two boat teams meeting may pass without confusion—it was wild and grand

I have mentioned my having been in some uncertainty and doubt at first relative to the sleeping arrangements on board this boat. I remained in the same vague state of mind until ten o'clock or thereabouts, when, going below, I found suspended on either side of the cabin three long tiers of hanging book-shelves, designed apparently for volumes of the small octavo size. Looking with greater attention at these contrivances (wondering to find such literary preparations in such a place), I descried on each shelf a sort of microscopic sheet and blanket, then I began dimly to comprehend that the passengers were the library, and that they were to be arranged, edgewise, on these shelves till morning

I was assisted to this conclusion by seeing some of them gathered round the master of the boat, at one of the tables, drawing lots with all the anxieties and passions of gamesters depicted in their countenances, while others, with small pieces of cardboard in their hands, were groping among the shelves in search of numbers corresponding with those they had drawn. As soon as any gentleman found his number, he took possession of it by immediately undressing himself and crawling into bed. The rapidity with which an agitated gambler subsided into a snoring slumberer was one of the most singular effects I have ever witnessed. As to the ladies, they were already abed, behind the red curtain, which was carefully drawn and pinned up the centre, though, as every cough, or sneeze, or whisper behind this curtain was perfectly audible before it, we had still a lively consciousness of their society

The politeness of the person in authority had secured to me a shelf in a nook near this red curtain, in some degree removed from the great body of sleepers, to which place I retired, with many acknowledgments to him for his attention. I found it, on after-measurement, just the width of an ordinary sheet of Bath post letter-paper, and I was at first in some uncertainty as to the best means of getting into it. But the shelf being a bottom one, I finally determined on lying upon the floor, rolling gently in, stopping immediately I touched the mattress, and remaining for the night with that side uppermost, whatever it might be Luckily, I came upon my back at exactly the right moment. I was much alarmed on looking upward to see, by the shape of his half-yard of sacking (which his weight had bent into an exceedingly tight bag), that there was a very heavy gentleman above me, whom the slender cords seemed quite incapable of holding, and I could not help reflecting upon the grief of my wife and family in the event of his coming down in the night. But as I could not have got up again without a severe bodily struggle, which might have alarmed the ladies, and as I had nowhere to go to even if I had, I shut my eyes upon the danger, and remained there

One of two remarkable circumstances is indisputably a fact, with reference to that class of society who travel in these boats. Either they carry their restlessness to such a pitch that they never sleep at all, or they expectorate in dreams, which would be a remarkable mingling of the real and ideal All night long, and every night, on this canal, there was a perfect storm and tempest of spitting, and once my coat, being in the very centre of a hurricane sustained by five gentlemen (which moved vertically, strictly carrying out Reid's Theory of the Law of Storms), I was fain the next morning to lay it on the deck, and rub it down with fair water before it was in a condition to be worn again.

Between five and six o'clock in the morning we got up, and some of us went on deck, to give them an opportunity of taking the shelves down, while others, the morning being very cold, crowded round the rusty stove, cherishing the newly-kindled fire, and filling the grate with those voluntary contributions of which they had been so liberal all night. The washing accommodations were primitive. There was a tin ladle chained to the deck, with which every gentleman who thought it necessary to cleanse himself (many were superior to this weakness) fished the dirty water out of the canal, and poured it into a tin basin, secured in like manner. There was also a jack-towel. And, hanging up before a little looking-glass in the bar, in the immediate vicinity of the bread and cheese and biscuits, were a public comb and harrbrush.

away, and the tables joined together, everybody sat down to the tea, coffee, bread, butter, salmon, shad, liver, steak, potatoes, pickles, ham, chops, black puddings, and sausages, all over again. Some were fond of compounding this variety, and having it all on their plates at once. As each gentleman got through his own personal amount of tea, coffee, bread, butter, salmon, shad, liver, steak, potatoes, pickles, ham, chops, black-puddings, and sausages, he rose up and walked off. When everybody had done with everything, the fragments were cleared away, and one of the waiters appearing anew in the character of a barber, shaved such of the company as desired to be shaved, while the remainder looked on, or yawned over their newspapers. Dinner was breakfast again, without the tea and coffee, and supper and breakfast were identical

There was a man on board this boat, with a light fresh coloured face, and a pepper and-salt suit of clothes, who was the most inquisitive fellow that can possibly be imagined. He never spoke otherwise than interrogatively. He was an embodied inquiry. Sitting down or standing up, still or moving, walking the deck or taking his meals, there he was, with a great note of interrogation in each eye, two in his cocked ears, two more in his turned-up nose and chin, at least half a dozen more about the corners of his mouth, and the largest one of all in his hair, which was brushed pertly off his forehead in a flaxen clump. Every button in his clothes said, "Eh? What's that? Did you speak? Say that again, will you?" He was always wide awake, like the enchanted bride who drove her husband frantic, always restless, always thirsting for answers, perpetually seeking and never finding.

I wore a fur greatcoat at that time, and before we were well clear of the wharf he questioned me concerning it, and its price, and where I bought it, and when, and what fur it was, and what it weighed, and what it cost. Then he took notice of my watch, and asked what that cost, and whether it was a French watch, and where I got it, and how I got it, and whether I bought it or had it given me, and how it went, and where the key-hole was, and when I wound it, every night or every morning, and whether I ever forgot to wind it at all, and if I did, what then? Where had I been to last, and where was I going next, and where was I going after that, and had I seen the President, and what did he say, and what did I say, and what did he say when I had said that? Eh? Lor now! do tell!

Finding that nothing would satisfy him, I evaded his questions after the first score or two, and in particular pleaded ignorance respecting the name of the fur whereof the coat was made. I am unable to say whether this was the reason, but that coat fascinated him ever afterwards. He usually kept close behind me as I walked, and moved as I moved, that he might look at it the better, and he frequently dived into narrow places after me at the risk of his life, that he might have he satisfaction of passing his hand up the back, and rubbing it the wrong way

We had another odd specimen on board, of a different kind. This was a thin-faced, spare-figured man of middle age and stature, dressed in a dusty, drabbish-coloured suit, such as I never saw before. He was perfectly quiet during the first part of the journey, indeed I don't remember having so much as seen him until he was brought out by circumstances, as great men often are. The conjunction of events which made him famous, happened, right, thus—

The canal extends to the foot of the mountain, and there, of course, it stops, the passengers being convey d across t by land carriage, and taken on afterwa ds by another canal boat, the counterpart of the first, which awaits them on the other side There are two canal lines of passage-boats—one is called The Express, and one (a cheaper one The Pioneer The Proneer gets first to the mount in, and waits for the Express people to come up, both sets of passengers being conveyed across it at the same time W were the Express company, but when we had crossed the mountain, and had come to the second boat, the propri tors took it into their heads to draft all the Pioneers into it lik wis, so that we were fiveand-forty at least, and the accession of passengers was not at all of that kind which improved the prospect of sleeping at night. Our people grumbled at this, as people do in such cases, but suffered the boat to be towed off with the whole freight aboard nevertheless, and away we went down the canal At home, I should have protested lustily, but being a foreigner here, I held my peace Not so this passenger He cleft a path among the people on deck (we were nearly all on deck), and without addressing anybody whomsoever, soliloguized as follows —

"This may suit you, this may, but it don't suit me This may be all very well with Down Easters, and men of Boston raising, but it won't suit my figure nohow, and no two ways about that, and so I tell you Now! I'm from the brown forests of the Mississippi, I am, and when the sun shines on me, it does shine—a little It don't glimmer where I live. the sun don't No I'm a brown forester, I am I an't a Johnny Cake. There are no smooth skins where I live We're rough men there Rather If Down Easters and men of Boston raising like this, I'm glad of it, but I'm none of that raising nor of that breed. No This company wants a little fixing, 2t does. I'm the wrong sort of man for 'em. I am They won't like me, they won't This is piling of it up, a little too mountainous, this is." At the end of every one of these short sentences he turned upon his heel, and walked the other way, checking himself abruptly when he had finished another short sentence, and turning back again

It is impossible for me to say what terrific meaning was hidden in the words of this brown forester, but I know that the other passengers looked on in a sort of admiring horror, and that presently the boat was put back to the wharf, and as many of the Pioneers as could be coaxed or bullied into

When we started again, some of the boldest spirits on board made bold to say to the obvious occasion of this improvement in our prospects, "Much obliged to you, sir," whereunto the brown forester (waving his hand, and still walking up and down as before) replied, "No, you an't. You're none o' my raising. You may act for yourselves, you may I have pinted out the way. Down Easters and Johnny Cakes can follow if they please. I an't a Johnny Cake, I an't. I am from the brown forests of the Mississipp, I am "—and so on, as before. He was unanimously voted one of the tables—in consideration for his public services; and he had the warmest corner by the stove throughout the rest of the journey But I never could find out that he did anything except sit there, nor did I hear him speak again until, in the midst of the bustle and turmoil of getting the luggage ashore in the dark at Pittsburg, I stumbled over him as he sat smoking a cigar on the cabin steps, and heard him muttering to himself, with a short laugh of defiance, "I an't a Johnny Cake, I an't. I'm from the brown forests of the Mississippi, I am, damme!" I am inclined to argue from this, that he had never left off saying so, but I could not make an affidavit of that part of the story, if required to do so by my Queen and country

As we have not reached Pittsburg yet, however, in the order of our narrative, I may go on to remark that breakfast was, perhaps, the least desirable meal of the day, as in addition to the many savoury odours arising from the eatables already mentioned, there were whiffs of gin, whisky, brandy, and rum, from the little bar hard by, and a decided seasoning of stale tobacco. Many of the gentlemen passengers were far from particular in respect of their linen, which was in some cases as yellow as the little rivulets that had trickled from the corners of their mouths in chewing, and dried there. Nor was the atmosphere quite free from zephyr whisperings of the thirty beds which had just been cleared away, and of which we were further and more pressingly reminded by the occasional appearance on the table-cloth of a kind of game not mentioned in the bill of fare

And yet, despite these oddities—and even they had, for me at least, a humour of their own—there was much in this mode of travelling which I heartily enjoyed at the time, and look back upon with great pleasure. Even the running up, bare-necked, at five o'clock in the morning, from the tainted cabin to the dirty deck, scooping up the icy water, plunging one's head into it, and drawing it out, all fresh and glowing with the cold, was a good thing. The fast, brisk walk upon the towing-path, between that time and breakfast, when every vein and artery seemed to tingle with health, the exquisite beauty of the opening day, when light came gleaming off from everything, the lazy motion of the boat, when one lay idly on the deck, looking through, rather than at, the deep blue sky;

the gliding on at night, so noiselessly, past frowning hills sullen with dark trees, and sometimes angry in one red burning spot high up, where unseen men lay crouching round a fire, the shining out of the bright stars, undisturbed by noise of wheels or steam, or any other sound than the liquid rippling of the water as the boat went on,—all these were

Then there were new settlements and detached log-cabins and frame houses, full of interest for strangers from an old country cabins with simple ovens, outside, made of clay, and lodgings for the pigs nearly as good as many of the human quarters, broken windows, patched with worn-out hats, old clothes, old boards, fragments of blankets and paper. and home made dressers standing in the open air without the door, whereon was ranged the household store, not hard to count, of earthe jars and pots The eye was pained to see the stumps of great trees 'hickly strewn in every field of wheat, and seldom to love the eternal swamp and dull morass, with hundreds of rotten trun s and twisted branches steeped in its unwholesome w ter. It was quite sad and oppressive to come upon great tr cts where settlers had been burning down the trees and where heir vounded bodies lay about, like those of murdored cre tu es, w' ile here and there some charred and blackened grant reared aloft two withered arms, and see ed to call down curses on his foes Some imes, at night, the way wound through some lonely go re. like a mount in pass it Scotl nd, hining and coldly glittering in the lig t of the moon, and so closed in by high steep hills all round that tlere se med to be no egress sav through the narrower path by which we had come, until one rugged hillside seemed to open, and shu ting out the moonlight as we passed into its gloomy throat, wrapped our new course in shade and darkness

We had left Harrisburg on Friday On Sunday morning we arrived at the foot of the mountain, which is crossed by railroad Th re are ten inclined planes—five ascending, and five descending, the carriages are dragged up the former, and let slowly down the latter, by means of stationary engines, the comparatively level spaces between being traversed, sometimes by horse, and sometimes by engine-power, as the case demands Occasionally the rails are laid upon the extreme verge of a giddy precipice, and looking from the carriage window the traveller gazes sheer down, without a stone or scrap of fence between, into the mountain depths below The journey is very carefully made, however—only two carriages travelling together, and while proper precautions are taken, is not to be dreaded for its dangers

It was very pretty travelling thus, at a rapid pace along the heights of the mountain in a keen wind, to look down into a valley full of light and softness-catching glimpses, through the tree-tops, of scattered cabins, children running to the doors, dogs bursting out to bark, whom we could see without hearing, terrified pigs scampering homewards, families sitting out in their rude gardens cows gazing upward with a stupid indifference, men in the shirt-sleeves looking on at their unfinished houses, Llanning out to-morrow's work, and we riding onward, high ab ve th m, like a whirlwind It was amusing, too, when we had dined, and rattled down a steep pass, having no other moving power than the weight of the carriages themselves, to see the engine released, long after us, come buzzing down alone, like a great insect. its back of green and gold so shaing in the sun, that if it had spread a pair of wings and soared away, no one would have had occasion, as I fancied, for the least surprise stopped short of us in a very businesslike manner when we reached the canal, and, before we left the wharf, went panting up this hill again, with the passengers who had waited our arrival for the means of traversing the road by which we

On the Monday evening, furnace fires and clanking hammers on the banks of the canal warned us that we approached the termination of this part of our journey. After going through another dreamy place—a long aqueduct across the Alleghany River, which was stranger than the bridge at Harrisburg, being a vast low wooden chamber full of water—we emerged upon that ugly confusion of backs of buildings and crazy galleries and stairs which always abuts on water, whether it be river, sea, canal, or ditch, and were at Pittsburg

Pittsburg is like Birmingham in England—at least its townspeople say so Setting aside the streets, the shops, the houses, wagons, factories, public buildings, and population, perhaps it may be It certainly has a great quantity of smoke hanging about it, and is famous for its iron-works. Besides the prison to which I have already referred, this town contains a pretty arsenal and other institutions. It is very beautifully situated on the Alleghany River, over which there are two bridges, and the villas of the wealthier citizens, sprinkled about the high grounds in the neighbourhood, are pretty enough. We lodged at a most excellent hotel, and were admirably served. As usual it was full of boarders, was very large, and had a broad colonnade to every story of the house large, and had a broad colonnade to every story of the house We tarried here three days. Our next point was Cincinnati, and as this was a steamboat journey, and western steamboats usually blow up one or two a week in the season, it was advisable to collect opinions in reference to the comparative safety of the vessels bound that way, then lying in the river. One called the Messenger was the best recommended. She had been advertised to start positively every day for a fortnight or so, and had not gone yet, nor did her captain seem to have any very fixed intention on the subject. But this is the custom, for if the law were to bind down a free and independent citizen to keep his word with the public, what would become of the liberty of the subject? Besides, it is in the way of trade. And if passengers be de coyed in the way of trade, and people be inconvenienced in the way of trade, what man, who is a sharp tradesman himself, shall say, "We must put a stop to this"?

Impressed by the deep solemnity of the public announcement, I (being then ignorant of these usages) was for hurrying on board in a breathless state immediately, but receiving private and confidential information that the boat would certainly not start until Friday, April the first, we made ourselves very comfortable in the meanwhile, and went on board

FROM PITTSBURG TO CINCINNATI IN A WESTERN STEAMBOAT CINCINNATI

THE Messenger was one among a crowd of high-pressure steamboats clustered together by a wharf-side, which, looked down upon from the rising ground that forms the landing-place, and backed by the lofty bank on the opposite side of the river, appeared no larger than so many floating models. She had some forty passengers on board, exclusive of the poorer persons on the lower deck, and in half an hour, or less, proceeded on her way

We had, for ourselves, a tiny state-room with two berths in it, opening out of the ladies' cabin There was, undoubtedly, something satisfactory in this "location," masmuch as it was m the stern, and we had been a great many times very gravely recommended to keep as far aft as possible, "because the steamboats generally blew up forward." Nor was this an unnecessary caution, as the occurrence and circumstances of more than one such fatality during our stay sufficiently testi-Apart from this source of self-congratulation, it was an unspeakable relief to have any place, no matter how confined, where one could be alone, and as the row of little chambers of which this was one had each a second glass-door besides that in the ladies' cabin, which opened on a narrow gallery outside the vessel, where the other passengers seldom came, and where one could sit in peace and gaze upon the shifting prospect, we took possession of our new quarters with much pleasure

If the native packets I have already described be unlike anything we are in the habit of seeing on water, these western vessels are still more foreign to all the ideas we are accustomed to entertain of boats. I hardly know what to liken them to, or how to describe them

In the first place, they have no mast, cordage, tackle, rigging, or other such boatlike gear, nor have they anything in their shape at all calculated to remind one of a boat's head, stern, sides, or keel Except that they are in the water, and display a couple of paddle-boxes, they might be intended, for anything that appears to the contrary, to perform some unknown service, high and dry, upon a mountain top. There is no visible deck, even—nothing but a long, black, ugly roof, covered with burnt-out feathery sparks, above which tower two iron chimneys, and a hoarse escape valve, and a glass steerage-house. Then, in order as the eye descends towards the water, are the sides, and doors, and windows of the state-rooms, jumbled as oddly together as though they formed a small street built by the varying tastes of a dozen men. The whole is supported on beams and pillars resting on a dirty barge, but a few inches above the water's edge, and in the narrow space between this upper structure and this barge's deck are the furnace fires and machinery, open at the sides to every wind that blows, and every storm of rain it drives along its path

Passing one of these boats at night, and seeing the great body of fire, exposed as I have just described, that rages and roars beneath the frail pile of painted wood—the machinery, not warded off or guarded in any way, but doing its work in the midst of the crowd of idlers and emigrants and children who throng the lower deck, under the management, too, of reckless men whose acquaintance with its mysteries may have been of six months' standing—one feels directly that the wonder is, not that there should be so many fatal acci-

Within, there is one long narrow cabin, the whole length of the boat, from which the state-rooms open, on both sides A small portion of it at the stern is partitioned off for the ladies, and the bar is at the opposite extreme. There is a long table down the centre, and at either end a stove. The washing apparatus is forward, on the deck. It is a little better than on board the canal boat, but not much. In all modes of travelling, the American customs, with reference to the means of personal cleanliness and wholesome ablution, are extremely negligent and filthy, and I strongly incline to the belief that a considerable amount of illness is referable to this cause.

We are to be on board the Messenger three days, arriving at Cincinnati (barring accidents) on Monday morning There are three meals a day—breakfast at seven, dinner at half-past twelve, supper about six At each, there are a great many small dishes and plates upon the table, with very little in them, so that, although there is every appearance of a mighty "spread," there is seldom really more than a joint—except for those who fancy slices of beetroot, shreds of dried beef, complicated entanglements of yellow pickle, maize,

Indian corn, apple sauce, and pumpkin.

Some people fancy all these little dainties together (and sweet preserves beside), by way of relish to their roast pig They are generally those dyspeptic ladies and gentlemen who eat unheard-of quantities of hot corn bread (almost as good for the digestion as a kneaded pin-cushion) for break fast and for supper Those who do not observe this custom, and who help themselves several times instead, usually suck their knives and forks meditatively, until they have decided what to take next, then pull them out of their mouths, put them in the dish, help themselves, and fall to work again At dinner, there is nothing to drink upon the table but great jugs full of cold water Nobody says anything, at any meal, to anybody All the passengers are very dismal, and seem to have tremendous secrets weighing on their minds is no conversation, no laughter, no cheerfulness, no sociality, except in spitting, and that is done in silent fellowship round the stove, when the meal is over Every man sits down, dull and languid, swallows his fare as if breakfasts, dinners, and suppers were necessities of nature never to be coupled with recreation or enjoyment, and having bolted his food in a gloomy silence, bolts himself in the same state But for these animal observances, you might suppose the whole male portion of the company to be the melancholy ghosts of departed book-keepers, who had fallen dead at the desk-such is their weary air of business and calculation Undertakers on duty would be sprightly beside them, and a collation of funeral-baked meats, in comparison with these meals, would be a sparkling festivity

The people are all alike, too There is no diversity of character They travel about on the same errands, say and do the same things in exactly the same manner, and follow in the same dull cheerless round. All down the long table there is scarcely a man who is in anything different from his neighbour It is quite a relief to have, sitting opposite, that little girl of fifteen with the loquacious chin, who, to do her justice, acts up to it, and fully identifies nature's handwriting, for of all the small chatterboxes that ever invaded the repose of drowsy ladies' cabins, she is the first and foremost. The beautiful girl who sits a little beyond her—farther down the table there—married the young man with the dark whiskers who sits beyond her, only last month. They are going to settle in the very Far West, where he has lived four years, but where she has never been. They were both overturned in a stage-coach the other day (a bad omen anywhere else, where overturns are not so common), and his head, which bears the marks of a recent wound, is bound up still. She was hurt too, at the same time, and lay insensible for some days, bright as her eyes are now.

Farther down still, sits a man who is going some miles beyond their place of destination, to "improve" a newly-discovered copper mine. He carries the village—that is to be—with him a few frame cottages, and an apparatus for smelting the copper. He carries its people too. They are partly American and partly Irish, and herd together on the lower deck, where they amused themselves last evening, till the night was pretty far advanced, by alternately firing off

They, and the very few who have been left at table twenty minutes, rise, and go away We do so too, and passing through our little state room, resume our seats in the quiet gallery without

A fine broad river always, but in some parts much wider than in others. And then there is usually a green island, covered with trees, dividing it into two streams. Occasionally we stop for a few minutes, maybe to take in wood, maybe for passengers, at some small town or village (I ought to say city—every place is a city here), but the banks are for the most part deep solitudes, overgrown with trees, which, hereabouts, are already in leaf and very green. For miles, and miles, and miles, these solitudes are unbroken by any sign of human life or trace of human footstep, nor is anything seen to move about them but the blue jay, whose colour is so bright, and yet so delicate, that it looks like a flying

flower At lengthened intervals a log cabin, with its little space of cleared land about it, nestles under a rising ground, and sends its thread of blue smoke curling up into the sky It stands in the corner of the poor field of wheat, which is full of great unsightly stumps, like earthy butchers' blocks full of great unsightly stumps, like earthy butchers' blocks Sometimes the ground is only just now cleared—the felled trees lying yet upon the soil, and the log-house only this morning begun. As we pass this clearing, the settler leans upon his axe or hammer, and looks wistfully at the people from the world. The children creep out of the temporary hut, which is like a gipsy tent upon the ground, and clap their hands and shout. The dog only glances round at us, and then looks up into his master's face again, as if he were rendered uneasy by any suspension of the common business, and had nothing more to do with pleasurers. And still there is the same eternal foreground. The river has washed away its banks, and stately trees have fallen down into the stream. its banks, and stately trees have fallen down into the stream Some have been there so long that they are mere dry grızzly Some have just toppled over, and having earth yet about their roots, are bathing their green heads in the river, and putting forth new shoots and branches Some are almost sliding down, as you look at them And some were drowned so long ago, that their bleached arms start out from the middle of the current, and seem to try to grasp the boat, and drag it under water Through such a scene as this, the unwieldy machine takes its hoarse sullen way venting, at every revolution of the paddles, a loud high-pressure blast, enough, one would think, to waken up the host of Indians who lie buried in a great mound yonder—so old, that mighty oaks and other forest trees have struck their roots into its earth, and so high, that it is a hill, even among the hills that Nature planted round it. The very river, as though it shared one's feelings of compassion for the extinct tribes who lived so pleasantly here, in their blessed ignorance of white existence, hundreds of years ago, steals out of its way to ripple near this mound, and there are few places where the Ohio sparkles more brightly than in the Big Grave Creek

All this I see as I sit in the little stern-gallery mentioned just now Evening slowly steals upon the landscape and changes it before me, when we stop to set some emigrants ashore

Five men, as many women, and a little girl All their worldly goods are a bag, a large chest, and an old chair—one old, high-backed, rush-bottomed chair—a solitary settler in itself. They are rowed ashore in the boat, while the vessel stands a little off awaiting its return, the water being shallow. They are landed at the foot of a high bank, on the summit of which are a few log cabins, attainable only by a long winding path. It is growing dusk, but the sun is very red, and shines in the water and on some of the tree-tops like fire

The men get out of the boat first, help out the women, take out the bag, the chest, the chair, bid the rowers "goodbye," and shove the boat off for them At the first plash of the oars in the water, the oldest woman of the party sits down in the old chair, close to the water's edge, without speaking a word None of the others sit down, though the chest is large enough for many seats They all stand where they landed, as if stricken into stone, and look after the boat So they remain, quite still and silent—the old woman and her old chair in the centre, the bag and chest upon the shore, without anybody heeding them-all eyes fixed upon the boat It comes alongside, is made fast, the men jump on board, the engine is put in motion, and we go hoarsely on again There they stand yet, without the motion of a hand I can see them through my glass, when, in the distance and increasing darkness, they are mere specks to the eve-lingering there still, the old woman in the old chair, and all the rest about her, not stirring in the least degree And thus I slowly lose them

The night is dark, and we proceed within the shadow of the wooded bank, which makes it darker. After gliding past the sombre maze of boughs for a long time, we come upon an open space where the tall trees are burning. The shape of every branch and twig is expressed in a deep red glow, and as the light wind stirs and ruffles it, they seem to vegetate in fire. It is such a sight as we read of in legends of enchanted forests—saving that it is sad to see these noble works wasting away so awfully alone, and to think how many years must come and go before the magic that created them will rear their like upon this ground again. But the time will come and when, in their changed ashes, the growth of centuries unborn has struck its roots, the restless men of distant ages will repair to these again unpeopled solitudes, and their fellows, in cities far away, that slumber now, perhaps, beneath the rolling sea, will read in language strange to any ears in being now, but very old to them, of primeval forests where the axe was never heard, and where the jungled ground was never trodden by a human foot

Midnight and sleep blot out these scenes and thoughts, and when the morning shines again, it gilds the housetops of a lively city, before whose broad paved wharf the boat is moored, with other boats, and flags, and moving wheels, and hum of men around it, as though there were not a solitary or silent rood of ground within the compass of a thousand miles

Cincinnati is a beautiful city-cheerful, thriving, and ani-I have not often seen a place that commends itself so favourably and pleasantly to a stranger at the first glance as this does, with its clean houses of red and white, its wellpaved roads, and footways of bright tile Nor does it become less prepossessing on a closer acquaintance The streets are broad and airy, the shops extremely good, the private residences remarkable for their elegance and neatness There is something of invention and fancy in the varying styles of these latter erections, which, after the dull company of the steamboat, is perfectly delightful, as conveying an assurance that there are such qualities still in existence. The disposition to ornament these pretty villas and render them attractive leads to the culture of trees and flowers, and the laying out of well-kept gardens, the sight of which, to those who walk along the streets, is inexpressibly refreshing and agree-I was quite charmed with the appearance of the town and its adjoining suburb of Mount Auburn, from which the city, lying in an amphitheatre of hills, forms a picture of remarkable beauty, and is seen to great advantage

There happened to be a great Temperance Convention held here on the day after our arrival, and as the order of march brought the procession under the windows of the hotel in which we lodged, when they started in the morning I had a good opportunity of seeing it—It comprised several thousand men—the members of various "Washington Auxiliary Temperance Societies"—and was marshalled by officers on horseback, who cantered briskly up and down the line, with scarfs and ribbons of bright colours fluttering out behind them gaily—There were bands of music too, and banners out of number, and it was a fresh, holiday-looking concourse altogether

I was particularly pleased to see the Irishmen, who formed a distinct society among themselves, and mustered very strong with their green scarfs—carrying their national Harp, and their portrait of Father Mathew, high above the people's heads They looked as jolly and good-humoured as ever, and, working (here) the hardest for their living, and doing any kind of sturdy labour that came in their way, were the most independent fellows there, I thought

The banners were very well painted, and flaunted down the street famously. There was the smiting of the rock, and the gushing forth of the waters, and there was a temperate man with "considerable of a hatchet" (as the standard-bearer would probably have said), aiming a deadly blow at a serpent which was apparently about to spring upon him from the top of a barrel of spirits. But the chief feature of this part of the show was a huge allegorical device, borne among the ship-carpenters, on one side whereof the steamboat Alcohol was represented bursting her boiler and exploding with a great crash, while upon the other the good ship Temperance sailed away with a fair wind, to the heart's content of the captain, crew, and passengers

After going round the town, the procession repaired to a certain appointed place, where, as the printed programme set forth, it would be received by the children of the different free schools "singing Temperance Songs". I was prevented from getting there in time to hear these Little Warblers, or to report upon this novel kind of vocal entertainment—novel, at least, to me—but I found, in a large open space, each society gathered round its own banners, and listening in silent attention to its own orator. The speeches, judging from the little I could hear of them, were certainly adapted to the occasion, as having that degree of relationship to cold water which wet blankets may claim, but the main thing was the conduct and appearance of the audience throughout the day, and that was admirable and full of promise

Cincinnati is honourably famous for its free schools, of which it has so many that no person's child among its population can, by possibility, want the means of education, which are extended, upon an average, to four thousand pupils annually I was only present in one of these establishments during the hours of instruction In the boys' department, which was full of little urchins (varying in their ages, I should say, from six years old to ten or twelve), the master offered to institute an extemporary examination of the pupils in algebra, a proposal which, as I was by no means confident of my ability to detect mistakes in that science, I declined with In the girls' school reading was proposed, and some alarm as I felt tolerably equal to that art, I expressed my willingness to hear a class Books were distributed accordingly, and some half-dozen girls relieved each other in reading paragraphs from English History But it seemed to be a dry compilation, infinitely above their powers, and when they had blundered through three or four dreary passages concerning the Treaty of Amiens, and other thrilling topics of the same nature (obviously without comprehending ten words), I expressed myself quite satisfied It is very possible that they only mounted to this exalted stave in the Ladder of Learning for the astonishment of a visitor, and that at other times they keep upon its lower rounds, but I should have been much better pleased and satisfied if I had heard them exercised in simpler lessons, which they understood

As in every other place I visited, the judges here were gentlemen of high character and attainments. I was in one of the courts for a few minutes, and found it like those to which I have already referred. A nuisance cause was trying. There were not many spectators, and the witnesses, counsel, and jury formed a sort of family circle, sufficiently jocose and snug

The society with which I mingled was intelligent, courteous, and agreeable The inhabitants of Cincinnati are proud of their city, as one of the most interesting in America and with good reason, for beautiful and thriving as it is now, and containing, as it does, a population of fifty thousand souls, but two-and fifty years have passed away since the ground on which it stands (bought at that time for a few dollars) was a wild wood, and its citizens were but a handful of dwellers in scattered log huts upon the river's shore

FROM CINCINNATI TO LOUISVILLE IN ANOTHER WESTERN STEAMBOAT, AND FROM LOUISVILLE TO ST LOUIS IN ANOTHER ST LOUIS

LEAVING Cincinnati at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, we embarked for Louisville in the Pike steamboat, which, carrying the mails, was a packet of a much better class than that in which we had come from Pittsburg. As this passage does not occupy more than twelve or thirteen hours, we arranged to go ashore that night, not coveting the distinction of sleeping in a state room when it was possible to sleep anywhere else

There chanced to be on board this boat, in addition to the usual dreary crowd of passengers, one Pitchlynn, a chief of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, who sent in his card to me, and with whom I had the pleasure of a long conversation

He spoke English perfectly well, though he had not begun to learn the language, he told me, until he was a young man grown. He had read many books, and Scott's poetry appeared to have left a strong impression on his mind, especially the opening of the Lady of the Lake, and the great battle scene in Marmion, in which, no doubt from the congeniality of the subjects to his own pursuits and tastes, he had great interest and delight. He appeared to understand correctly all he had read, and whatever fiction had enlisted his sympathy in its belief, had done so keenly and earnestly—I might almost say fiercely. He was dressed in our ordinary everyday costume, which hung about his fine figure loosely, and with indifferent grace. On my telling him that I regretted not to see him in his own attire, he threw up his right arm for a moment, as though he were brandishing some heavy weapon, and answered, as he let it fall again, that his race were losing many things besides their dress, and would soon be seen upon the earth no more, but he wore it at home, he added proudly

He told me that he had been away from his home, west of the Mississippi, seventeen months, and was now returning He had been chiefly at Washington on some negotiations pending between his tribe and the Government—which were not settled yet (he said in a melancholy way), and he feared never would be, for what could a few poor Indians do against such well skilled men of business as the whites? He had no love for Washington, tired of towns and cities very soon, and longed for the forest and the prairie

I asked him what he thought of Congress? He answered, with a smile, that it wanted dignity in an Indian's eyes

He would very much like, he said, to see England before he died, and spoke with much interest about the great things to be seen there. When I told him of that chamber in the British Museum wherein are preserved household memorials of a race that ceased to be thousands of years ago, he was very attentive, and it was not hard to see that he had a reference in his mind to the gradual fading away of his own people.

This led us to speak of Mr Cathn's gallery, which he praised highly, observing that his own portrait was among the collection, and that all the likenesses were "elegant" Mr Cooper, he said, had painted the Red Man well, and so would I, he knew, if I would go home with him and hunt buffaloes, which he was quite anxious I should do When I told him that, supposing I went, I should not be very likely to damage the buffaloes much, he took it as a great joke and

He was a remarkably handsome man, some years past forty, I should judge, with long, black hair, an aquiline nose, broad cheek-bones, a sunburnt complexion, and a very bright, keen, dark, and piercing eye. There were but twenty thousand of the Choctaws left, he said, and their number was decreasing every day. A few of his brother chiefs had been obliged to become civilized, and to make themselves acquainted with what the whites knew, for it was their only chance of existence But they were not many, and the rest were as they always had been He dwelt on this, and said several times that unless they tried to assimilate themselves to their conquerors, they must be swept away before the strides of civilized society

When we shook hands at parting, I told him he must come to England, as he longed to see the land so much, that I should hope to see him there one day, and that I could promise him he would be well received and kindly treated. He was evidently pleased by this assurance, though he rejoined, with a good humoured smile and an arch shake of his head, that the English used to be very fond of the Red Men when they wanted their help, but had not cared much for them since

He took his leave, as stately and complete a gentleman of Nature's making as ever I beheld, and moved among the people in the boat, another kind of being. He sent me a lithographed portrait of himself soon afterwards—very like, though scarcely handsome enough—which I have carefully preserved in memory of our brief acquaintance.

There was nothing very interesting in the scenery of this day's journey, which brought us at midnight to Louisville We slept at the Galt House, a splendid hotel, and were as handsomely lodged as though we had been in Paris, rather than hundreds of miles beyond the Alleghanies

The city presenting no objects of sufficient interest to detain us on our way, we resolved to proceed next day by another steamboat, the Fulton, and to join it, about noon, at a suburb called Portland, where it would be delayed some time

The interval after breakfast we devoted to riding through the town, which is regular and cheerful, the streets being laid out at right angles, and planted with young trees. The buildings are smoky and blackened, from the use of bituminous coal, but an Englishman is well used to that appearance, and indisposed to quarrel with it. There did not appear to be much business stirring, and some unfinished buildings and improvements seemed to intimate that the city had been overbuilt in the ardour of "going ahead," and was suffering under the reaction consequent upon such feverish forcing of its powers.

On our way to Portland we passed a "Magistrate's office," which amused me, as looking far more like a dame's school than any police establishment, for this awful institution was nothing but a little, lazy, good-for-nothing front parlour, open to the street, wherein two or three figures (I presume the magistrate and his myrmidons) were basking in the sunshine, the very effigies of languor and repose — It was a perfect picture of Justice retired from business for want of customers, her sword and scales sold off, napping comfortably with her legs upon the table

Here, as elsewhere in these parts, the road was perfectly alive with pigs of all ages, lying about in every direction, fast asleep, or grunting along in quest of hidden dainties. I had always a sneaking kindness for these odd animals, and found a constant source of amusement, when all others failed, in watching their proceedings. As we were riding along this morning, I observed a little incident between two youthful pigs, which was so very human as to be inexpressibly comical and grotesque at the time, though I dare say, in telling, it is

One young gentleman (a very delicate porker, with several straws sticking about his nose, betokening recent investigations in a dunghill) was walking deliberately on, profoundly thinking, when suddenly his brother, who was lying in a miry hole unseen by him, rose up immediately before his startled eyes, ghostly with damp mud Never was pig's whole mass of blood so turned. He started back at least three feet, gazed for a moment, and then shot off as hard as he could go, his excessively little tail vibrating with speed and terror like a distracted pendulum But before he had gone very far, he began to reason with himself as to the nature of this frightful appear ance, and, as he reasoned, he relaxed his speed by gradual degrees, until at last he stopped, and faced about. There was his brother, with the mud upon him glazing in the sun, yet staring out of the very same hole, perfectly amazed at his proceedings He was no sooner assured of this-and he assured himself so carefully that one may almost say he shaded his eyes with his hand to see the better-than he came back at a round trot, pounced upon him, and summarily took off a piece of his tail, as a caution to him to be careful what he was about for the future, and never to play tricks with his family any more

We found the steamboat in the canal, waiting for the slow process of getting through the lock, and went on board, where we shortly afterwards had a new kind of visitor in the person of a certain Kentucky Giant, whose name is Porter, and who is of the moderate height of seven feet eight inches in his stockings

There never was a race of people who so completely gave the he to history as these giants, or whom all the chroniclers have so cruelly libelled Instead of roaring and ravaging about the world, constantly catering for their cannibal larders, and perpetually going to market in an unlawful manner, they are the meekest people in any man's acquaintance, rather inclining to milk and vegetable diet, and bearing anything for So decidedly are amiability and mildness their characteristics, that I confess I look upon that youth who distinguished himself by the slaughter of these inoffensive persons as a false-hearted brigand, who, pretending to philanthropic motives, was secretly influenced only by the wealth stored up within their castles and the hope of plunder And I lean the more to this opinion from finding that even the historian of those exploits, with all his partiality for his hero. is fain to admit that the slaughtered monsters in question were of a very innocent and simple turn, extremely guileless and ready of belief, lending a credulous ear to the most improbable tales, suffering themselves to be easily entrapped into pits, and even (as in the case of the Welsh Giant), with an excess of the hospitable politeness of a landlord, ripping themselves open, rather than hint at the possibility of their guests being versed in the vagabond arts of sleight-of-hand and hocus-pocus

The Kentucky Giant was but another illustration of the truth of this position. He had a weakness in the region of the knees, and a trustfulness in his long face, which appealed even to five-feet nine for encouragement and support. He was only twenty-five years old, he said, and had grown recently, for it had been found necessary to make an addition to the legs of his inexpressibles. At fifteen he was a short boy, and in those days his English father and his Irish mother had rather snubbed him, as being too small of stature to sustain the credit of the family He added that his health had not been good, though it was better now, but short people are not wanting who whisper that he drinks too hard

I understand he drives a hackney-coach, though how he does it, unless he stands on the footboard behind, and lies along the roof upon his chest, with his chin in the box, it would be difficult to comprehend. He brought his gun with him as a curiosity. Christened "The Little Rifle," and displayed outside a shop-window, it would make the fortune of any retail business in Holborn. When he had shown himself and talked a little while, he withdrew with his pocket-instrument, and went bobbing down the cabin, among men of six feet high and upwards, like a lighthouse walking among lamp-posts.

Within a few minutes afterwards we were out of the canal and in the Ohio River again

The arrangements of the boat were like those of the Messenger, and the passengers were of the same order of people We fed at the same times, on the same kind of viands, in the same dull manner, and with the same observances company appeared to be oppressed by the same tremendous concealments, and had as little capacity of enjoyment or light-heartedness I never in my life did see such listless, heavy dullness as brooded over these meals, the very recollection of it weighs me down, and makes me, for the moment, wretched Reading and writing on my knee in our little cabin, I really dreaded the coming of the hour that summoned us to table, and was as glad to escape from it again as if it had been a penance or a punishment Healthy cheerfulness and good spirits forming a part of the banquet, I could soak my crusts in the fountain with Le Sage's strolling player, and revel in their glad enjoyment, but sitting down with so many fellow-animals to ward off thirst and hunger as a business, to empty, each creature, his Yahoo's trough as quickly as he can, and then slink sullenly away, to have these social sacraments stripped of everything but the mere greedy satisfaction of the natural cravings, goes so against the grain with me, that I seriously believe the recollection of these funeral feasts will be a waking nightmare to me all my life.

There was some relief in this boat too, which there had not been in the other, for the captain (a blunt good-natured fellow) had his handsome wife with him, who was disposed to be lively and agreeable, as were a few other lady-passengers who had their seats about us at the same end of the table. But nothing could have made head against the depressing influence of the general body. There was a magnetism of dullness in them which would have beaten down the most facetious companion that the earth ever knew. A jest would have been a crime, and a smile would have faded into a grinning horror Such deadly leaden people, such systematic, plodding, weary, insupportable heaviness, such a mass of animated indigestion in respect of all that was genial, jovial, frank, social, or hearty, never, sure, was brought together elsewhere since the world began

Nor was the scenery, as we approached the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, at all inspiriting in its influence. The trees were stunted in their growth, the banks were low and flat, the settlements and log cabins fewer in number, their inhabitants more wan and wretched than any we had encountered yet. No songs of birds were in the air, no pleasant scents, no moving lights and shadows from swift passing clouds. Hour after hour, the changeless glare of the hot, unwinking sky shone upon the same monotonous objects. Hour after hour, the river rolled along, as wearily and slowly as the time itself.

At length, upon the morning of the third day, we arrived at a spot so much more desolate than any we had yet beheld, that the forlomest places we had passed were, in comparison with it, full of interest. At the junction of the two rivers, on ground so flat and low and marshy that at certain seasons of the year it is inundated to the house-tops, lies a breeding-place of fever, ague, and death, vaunted in England as a mine of Golden Hope, and speculated in, on the faith of monstrous representations, to many people's ruin. A dismal swamp, on which the half-built houses rot away, cleared here and there for the space of a few yards, and teeming, then, with rank, unwholesome vegetation, in whose baleful shade the wretched wanderers who are tempted hither, droop, and die, and lay their bones, the hateful Mississippi circling and eddying before it, and turning off upon its southern course, a slimy monster hideous to behold, a hotbed of disease, an ugly sepulchre, a grave uncheered by any gleam of promise, a place without one single quality, in earth or air or water, to commend it such is this dismal Cairo

But what words shall describe the Mississippi, great father of rivers, who (praise be to Heaven) has no young children like him! An enormous ditch, sometimes two or three miles wide, running liquid mud, six miles an hour, its strong and frothy current choked and obstructed everywhere by huge logs and whole forest trees-now twining themselves together in great rafts, from the interstices of which a sedgy lazy foam works up, to float upon the water's top, now rolling past like monstrous bodies, their tangled roots showing like matted hair, now glancing singly by like giant leeches, and now writhing round and round in the vortex of some small whirlpool, like wounded snakes The banks low, the trees dwarfish, the marshes swarming with frogs, the wretched cabins few and far apart, their inmates hollow-cheeked and pale, the weather very hot, mosquitoes penetrating into every crack and crevice of the boat, mud and slime on everything nothing pleasant in its aspect but the harmless lightning which flickers every night upon the dark horizon.

For two days we toiled up this foul stream, striking constantly against the floating timber, or stopping to avoid those more dangerous obstacles the snags, or sawyers, which are the hidden trunks of trees that have their roots below the tide. When the nights are very dark, the look-out stationed in the head of the boat knows by the ripple of the water if any great impediment be near at hand, and rings a bell beside him, which is the signal for the engine to be stopped, but always in the night this bell has work to do, and after every ring there comes a blow which renders it no easy matter to remain in bed.

The decline of day here was very gorgeous, tingeing the firmament deeply with red and gold, up to the very keystone of the arch above us. As the sun went down behind the bank, the slightest blades of grass upon it seemed to become as distinctly visible as the arteries in the skeleton of a leaf, and when, as it slowly sank, the red and golden bars upon the water grew dimmer, and dimmer yet, as if they were sinking too, and all the glowing colours of departing day paled, inch by inch, before the sombre night, the scene became a thousand times more lonesome and more dreary than before, and all its influences darkened with the sky

We drank the muddy water of this river while we were upon it. It is considered wholesome by the natives, and is something more opaque than gruel I have seen water like it at the filter shops, but nowhere else

On the fourth night after leaving Louisville, we reached St Louis, and here I witnessed the conclusion of an incident, trifling enough in itself, but very pleasant to see, which had interested me during the whole journey

There was a little woman on board, with a little baby, and both little woman and little child were cheerful, good looking, bright eyed, and fair to see The little woman had been passing a long time with her sick mother in New York, and had left her home in St Louis in that condition in which ladies who truly love their lords desire to be The baby was born in her mother's house, and she had not seen her husband (to whom she was now returning) for twelve months, having left him a month or two after their marriage

Well, to be sure, there never was a little woman so full of hope, and tenderness, and love, and anxiety, as this little woman was, and all day long she wondered whether "He' would be at the wharf, and whether "He" had got her letter, and whether, if she sent the baby ashore by somebody else, "He" would know it, meeting it in the street-which. seeing that he had never set eyes upon it in his life, was not very likely in the abstract, but was probable enough to the young mother She was such an artless little creature, and was in such a sunny, beaming, hopeful state, and let out all this matter clinging close about her heart so freely, that all the other lady passengers entered into the spirit of it as much as she, and the captain (who heard all about it from his wife) was wondrous sly, I promise you-inquiring, every time we met at table, as in forgetfulness, whether she expected anybody to meet her at St Louis, and whether she would want to go ashore the night we reached it (but he supposed she wouldn't), and cutting many other dry jokes of that nature There was one little weazen, dried-apple-faced old woman, who took occasion to doubt the constancy of husbands in such circumstances of bereavement, and there was another lady (with a lap dog) old enough to moralize on the lightness of human affections, and yet not so old that she could help nursing the baby, now and then, or laughing with the rest when the little woman called it by its father's name, and asked it all manner of fantastic questions concerning him in the joy of her heart

It was something of a blow to the little woman, that when we were within twenty miles of our destination, it became clearly necessary to put this baby to bed. But she got over it with the same good-humour, tied a handkerchief round her head, and came out into the little gallery with the rest. Then, such an oracle as she became in reference to the localities! and such facetiousness as was displayed by the married ladies! and such sympathy as was shown by the single ones! and such peals of laughter as the little woman herself (who would just as soon have cried) greeted every jest with!

At last there were the lights of St Louis, and here was the wharf, and those were the steps, and the little woman, covering her face with her hands, and laughing (or seeming to laugh) more than ever, ran into her own cabin, and shut herself up I have no doubt that, in the charming inconsistency of such excitement, she stopped her ears, lest she should hear "Him" asking for her, but I did not see her do it

Then a great crowd of people rushed on board, though the boat was not yet made fast, but was wandering about, among the other boats, to find a landing-place, and everybody looked for the husband, and nobody saw him, when, in the midst of us all—Heaven knows how she ever got there—there was the little woman clinging with both arms tight round the neck of a fine, good-looking, sturdy young fellow! and in a moment afterwards, there she was again, actually clapping her little hands for joy, as she dragged him through the small door of her small cabin to look at the baby as he lay asleep!

We went to a large hotel, called the Planter's House, built like an English hospital, with long passages and bare walls, and skylights above the room doors for the free circulation of air. There were a great many boarders in it, and as many lights sparkled and glistened from the windows down into the street below, when we drove up, as if it had been illuminated on some occasion of rejoicing. It is an excellent house, and the proprietors have most bountiful notions of providing the creature comforts. Dining alone with my wife in our own room one day, I counted fourteen dishes on the table at once.

In the old French portion of the town the thoroughfares are narrow and crooked, and some of the houses are very quaint and picturesque, being built of wood, with tumble-down galleries before the windows, approachable by stairs or rather ladders from the street. There are queer little barbers' shops and drinking houses, too, in this quarter, and abundance of crazy old tenements with blinking casements, such as may be seen in Flanders. Some of these ancient habitations, with high garret gable-windows perking into the roofs, have a kind of French shrug about them, and being lop sided with age, appear to hold their heads askew, besides, as if they were grimacing in astonishment at the American Improvements

It is hardly necessary to say, that these consist of wharves and warehouses, and new buildings in all directions, and of a great many vast plans which are still "progressing" Already, however, some very good houses, broad streets, and marble-fronted shops, have gone so far ahead as to be in a state of completion, and the town bids fair in a few years to improve considerably, though it is not likely ever to vie, in point of elegance or beauty, with Cincinnati

The Roman Catholic religion, introduced here by the early French settlers, prevails extensively. Among the public institutions are a Jesuit college, a convent for "the Ladies of the Sacred Heart," and a large chapel attached to the college, which was in course of erection at the time of my visit, and was intended to be consecrated on the second of December in the next year. The architect of this building is one of the reverend fathers of the school, and the works proceed under his sole direction. The organ will be sent from Belgium.

In addition to these establishments, there is a Roman Catholic cathedral, dedicated to St Francis Xavier, and a hospital, founded by the munificence of a deceased resident, who was a member of that church It also sends missionaries from hence among the Indian tribes

The Unitarian church is represented in this remote place, as in most other parts of America, by a gentleman of great worth and excellence. The poor have good reason to remember and bless it, for it befriends them, and aids the cause of rational education, without any sectarian or selfish views. It is liberal in all its actions, of kind construction, and of wide benevolence.

There are three free-schools already erected, and in full operation in this city. A fourth is building, and will soon be

No man ever admits the unhealthiness of the place he dwells in (unless he is going away from it), and I shall there fore, I have no doubt, be at issue with the inhabitants of St Louis, in questioning the perfect salubrity of its climate, and in hinting that I think it must rather dispose to fever in the summer and autumnal seasons. Just adding that it is very hot, lies among great rivers, and has vast tracts of undrained swampy land around it, I leave the reader to form his own opinion.

As I had a great desire to see a prairie before turning back from the farthest point of my wanderings, and as some gentlemen of the town had, in their hospitable consideration, an equal desire to gratify me, a day was fixed, before my departure, for an expedition to the Looking-Glass Prairie, which is within thirty miles of the town Deeming it possible that my readers may not object to know what kind of thing such a gipsy party may be at that distance from home, and among what sort of objects it moves, I will describe the jaunt in another chapter

A JAUNT TO THE LOOKING-GLASS PRAIRIE AND BACK

I MAY premise that the word prairie is variously pronounced paraaer, parearer, and paroarer The latter mode of pronunciation is perhaps the most in favour

We were fourteen in all, and all young men indeed it is a singular though very natural feature in the society of these distant settlements, that it is mainly composed of adventurous persons in the prime of life, and has very few grey heads among it. There were no ladies—the trip being a fatiguing one—and we were to start at five o'clock in the morning punctually.

I was called at four, that I might be certain of keeping nobody waiting, and having got some bread and milk for breakfast, threw up the window and looked down into the street, expecting to see the whole party busily astir, and great preparations going on below. But as everything was very quiet, and the street presented that hopeless aspect with which five o'clock in the morning is familiar elsewhere, I deemed it as well to go to bed again, and went accordingly

I awoke again at seven o'clock, and by that time the party had assembled, and were gathered round one light carriage with a very stout axle-tree, one something on wheels like an amateur carrier's cart, one double phaeton of great antiquity and unearthly construction, one gig with a great hole in its back and a broken head, and one inder on horseback who was to go on before. I got into the first coach with three companions, the rest bestowed themselves in the other vehicles, two large baskets were made fast to the lightest, two large stone jars in wicker cases, technically known as demi johns, were consigned to the "least rowdy" of the party for safe keeping, and the procession moved off to the ferry-boat, in which it was to cross the river bodily, men, horses, carriages, and all, as the manner in these parts is

We got over the river in due course, and mustered again before a little wooden box on wheels, hove down all aslant in a morass, with "MERCHANT TAILOR" painted in very large letters over the door Having settled the order of proceedmg, and the road to be taken, we started off once more, and began to make our way through an ill-favoured Black Hollow, called, less expressively, the American Bottom

The previous day had been-not to say hot, for the term is weak and lukewarm in its power of conveying an idea of the temperature The town had been on fire—in a blaze But at night it had come on to rain in torrents, and all night long it had rained without cessation. We had a pair of very strong horses, but travelled at the rate of little more than a couple of miles an hour, through one unbroken slough of black mud and water It had no variety but in depth Now it was only half over the wheels, now it hid the axle-tree, and now the coach sank down in it almost to the windows air resounded in all directions with the loud chirping of the frogs, who, with the pigs (a coarse, ugly breed, as unwholesome looking as though they were the spontaneous growth of the country), had the whole scene to themselves Here and there we passed a log hut, but the wretched cabins were wide apart and thinly scattered, for though the soil is very rich in this place, few people can exist in such a deadly atmosphere On either side of the track, if it deserve the name, was the thick "bush," and everywhere was stagnant, slimy, rotten, filthy water

As it is the custom in these parts to give a horse a gallon or so of cold water whenever he is in a foam with heat, we halted for that purpose at a log inn in the wood, far removed from any other residence It consisted of one room, bareroofed and bare-walled of course, with a loft above. The ministering priest was a swarthy young savage, in a shirt of cotton print like bed-furniture, and a pair of ragged trousers. There were a couple of young boys, too, nearly naked, lying idly by the well, and they, and he, and the traveller at the

The traveller was an old man with a grey gristly beard two inches long, a shaggy moustache of the same hue, and enormous eyebrows, which almost obscured his lazy, semidrunken glance, as he stood regarding us with folded arms, poising himself alternately upon his toes and heels, On being addressed by one of the party, he drew nearer, and said, rubbing his chin (which scraped under his horny hand like fresh gravel beneath a nailed shoe), that he was from Delaware, and had lately bought a farm "down there," pointing into one of the marshes where the stunted trees were thickest. He was "going," he added, to St Louis, to fetch his family, whom he had left behind, but he seemed in no great hurry to bring on these encumbrances, for when we moved away he loitered back into the cabin, and was plainly bent on stopping there so long as his money lasted. He was a great politician, of course, and explained his opinions at some length to one of our company, but I only remember that he concluded with two sentiments, one of which was, Somebody for ever, and the other, Blast everybody else! which is by no means a bad abstract of the general creed in these matters

When the horses were swollen out to about twice their natural dimensions (there seems to be an idea here that this kind of inflation improves their going), we went forward again through mud and mire, and damp, and festering heat, and brake and bush, attended always by the music of the frogs and pigs, until nearly noon, when we halted at a place called

Belleville

Belleville was a small collection of wooden houses, huddled together in the very heart of the bush and swamp Many of them had singularly bright doors of red and yellow, for the place had been lately visited by a travelling painter, "who got along," as I was told, "by eating his way" The criminal court was sitting, and was at that moment trying some criminals for horse-stealing, with whom it would most likely go hard, for live stock of all kinds, being necessarily very much exposed in the woods, is held by the community in rather higher value than human life, and for this reason juries generally make a point of finding all men indicted for cattle-stealing guilty, whether or no

The horses belonging to the bar, the judge, and witnesses, were tied to temporary racks set up roughly in the road—by which is to be understood, a forest path, nearly knee-deep in mud and slime.

There was an hotel in this place, which, like all hotels in America, had its large dining-room for the public table. It was an odd, shambling, low-roofed outhouse, half-cowshed and half-kitchen, with a coarse brown canvas tablecloth, and tin sconces stuck against the walls to hold candles at supper time. The horseman had gone forward to have coffee and some eatables prepared, and they were by this time nearly ready. He had ordered "wheat-bread and chicken fixings," in preference to "corn-bread and common doings." The latter kind of refection includes only pork and bacon. The former comprehends broiled ham, sausages, veal cutlets, steaks, and such other viands of that nature as may be supposed, by a tolerably wide poetical construction, "to fix" a chicken comfortably in the digestive organs of any lady or gentleman.

On one of the doorposts at this inn was a tin plate, whereon was inscribed in characters of gold, "Doctor Crocus," and on a sheet of paper, pasted up by the side of this plate, was a written announcement that Dr Crocus would that evening deliver a lecture on Phrenology for the benefit of the Belleville public, at a charge, for admission, of so much a

Straying upstairs, during the preparation of the chicken fixings, I happened to pass the Doctor's chamber, and as the door stood wide open, and the room was empty, I made

bold to peep in

It was a bare, unfurnished, comfortless room, with an unframed portrait hanging up at the head of the bed—a likeness, I take it, of the Doctor, for the forehead was fully displayed, and great stress was laid by the artist upon its phrenological developments. The bed itself was covered with an old patchwork counterpane. The room was destitute of carpet or of curtain. There was a damp fireplace without any stove, full of wood ashes, a chair, and a very small table, and on the last-named piece of furniture was displayed, in grand array, the Doctor's library, consisting of some half-dozen greasy old books.

Now, it certainly looked about the last apartment on the whole earth out of which any man would be likely to get anything to do him good. But the door, as I have said, stood coaxingly open, and plainly said in conjunction with the chair, the portrait, the table, and the books, "Walk in, gentlemen, walk in! Don't be ill, gentlemen, when you may be well in no time Doctor Crocus is here, gentlemen—the celebrated Doctor Crocus! Doctor Crocus has come all this way to cure you, gentlemen If you haven't heard of Doctor Crocus, it's your fault, gentlemen, who live a little way out of the world here, not Doctor Crocus's Walk in, gentlemen, walk in!"

In the passage below, when I went downstairs again, was Doctor Crocus himself A crowd had flocked in from the Court House, and a voice from among them called out to the landlord. "Colonel introduce Doctor Crocus"

"Mr Dickens," says the colonel, "Doctor Crocus"

Upon which Doctor Crocus, who is a tall, fine-looking Scotchman, but rather fierce and warlike in appearance for a professor of the peaceful art of healing, bursts out of the concourse with his right arm extended, and his chest thrown out as far as it will possibly come, and says,—

"Your countryman, sir !"

Whereupon Doctor Crocus and I shake hands, and Doctor Crocus looks as if I didn't by any means realize his expectations, which, in a linen blouse, and a great straw hat with a green ribbon, and no gloves, and my face and nose profusely ornamented with the stings of mosquitoes and the bites of bugs, it is very likely I did not "Long in these parts, sir?" says I

"Three or four months, sır," says the Doctor

"Do you think of soon returning to the old country, sir?" says I

Doctor Crocus makes no verbal answer, but gives me an imploring look, which says so plainly, "Will you ask me that again, a little louder, if you please?" that I repeat the question.

"Think of soon returning to the old country, sir '" repeats

"To the old country, sir," L rejoin -

Doctor Crocus looks round upon the crowd to observe the effect he produces, rubs his hands, and says in a very loud voice.—

"Not yet awhile, sir, not yet You won't catch me at that just yet, sir I am a little too fond of freedom for that, sir Ha, ha! No, no! Ha, ha! None of that till one's obliged to do it, sir No, no!"

As Doctor Crocus says these latter words, he shakes his head knowingly, and laughs again Many of the bystanders shake their heads in concert with the Doctor, and laugh too. and look at each other as much as to say, "A pretty bright and first-rate sort of chap is Crocus t" and unless I am very much mistaken, a good many people went to the lecture that night who never thought about phrenology, or about Doctor Crocus either, in all their lives before

From Belleville, we went on through the same desolate kind of waste, and constantly attended, without the interval of a moment, by the same music, until, at three o'clock in the afternoon, we halted once more at a village called Lebanon to inflate the horses again, and give them some corn besides. of which they stood much in need Pending this ceremony, I walked into the village, where I met a full-sized dwellinghouse coming downhill at a round trot, drawn by a score or more of oxen

The public house was so very clean and good a one, that the managers of the jaunt resolved to return to it and put up there for the night if possible This course decided on, and the horses being well refreshed, we again pushed forward, and

It would be difficult to say why or how-though it was possibly from having heard and read so much about it-but the effect on me was disappointment Looking towards the setting sun, there lay, stretched out before my view, a vast expanse of level ground, unbroken, save by one thin line of trees, which scarcely amounted to a scratch upon the great blank, until it met the glowing sky, wherein it seemed to dip, mingling with its rich colours, and mellowing in its distant blue There it lay, a tranquil sea or lake without water, if such a simile be admissible, with the day going down upon it, a few birds wheeling here and there, and solitude and silence reigning paramount around. But the grass was not yet high, there were bare black patches on the ground, and the few wild flowers that the eye could see were poor and scanty Great as the picture was, its very flatness and extent, which left nothing to the imagination, tamed it down and cramped its interest I felt little of that sense of freedom and exhibaration which a Scottish heath inspires, or even our

English downs awaken. It was lonely and wild, but oppressive in its barren monotony. I felt that in traversing the prairies I could never abandon myself to the scene, forgetful of all else, as I should do instinctively were the heather underneath my feet or an iron-bound coast beyond, but should often glance towards the distant and frequentlyreceding line of the horizon, and wish it gained and passed It is not a scene to be forgotten, but it is scarcely one. I think (at all events, as I saw it), to remember with much pleasure, or to covet the looking on again in after-life

We encamped near a solitary log-house, for the sake of its water, and dined upon the plain The baskets contained roast fowls, buffalo's tongue (an exquisite dainty, by the way), ham, bread, cheese, and butter, biscuits, champagne, sherry, lemons and sugar for punch, and abundance of rough ice The meal was delicious, and the entertainers were the soul of kindness and good humour I have often recalled that cheerful party to my pleasant recollection since, and shall not easily forget, in junketings nearer home with friends of

Returning to Lebanon that night, we lay at the little inn at which we had halted in the afternoon. In point of cleanliness and comfort, it would have suffered by no comparison with any village alehouse, of a homely kind, in England

Rising at five o'clock next morning, I took a walk about the village-none of the houses were strolling about to-day, but it was early for them yet, perhaps—and then amused my-self by lounging in a kind of farmyard behind the tavern, of which the leading features were a strange jumble of rough sheds for stables, a rude colonnade, built as a cool place of summer resort, a deep well, a great earthen mound for keeping vegetables in in winter time, and a pigeon-house, whose little apertures looked, as they do in all pigeon-houses, very much too small for the admission of the plump and swelling-breasted birds who were strutting about it, though hey tried to get in never so hard. That interest exhausted, I took a survey of the inn's two parlours, which were decorated with coloured prints of Washington and President Madison, and of a white-faced young lady (much speckled by the flies), who held up her gold neck-chain for the admiration of the spectator, and informed all admiring comers that she was "Just Seventeen," although I should have thought her older In the best room were two oil portraits of the kit-cat size, representing the landlord and his infant son, both looking as bold as lions, and staring out of the canvas with an intensity that would have been cheap at any price They were painted, I think, by the artist who had touched up the Belleville doors with red and gold, for I seemed to

After breakfast, we started to return by a different way from that which we had taken yesterday, and coming up at ten o'clock with an encampment of German emigrants carrying their goods in carts, who had made a rousing fire which they were just quitting, stopped there to refresh. And very pleasant the fire was, for, hot though it had been yesterday, it was quite cold to-day, and the wind blew keenly Looming in the distance, as we rode along, was another of the ancient Indian burial-places, called The Monks' Mound, in memory of a body of fanatics of the order of La Trappe, who founded a desolate convent there many years ago, when there were no settlers within a thousand miles, and were all swept off by the pernicious climate—in which lamentable fatality few rational people will suppose, perhaps, that society experienced any very severe deprivation

The track of to-day had the same features as the track of yesterday There were the swamp, the bush, the perpetual chorus of frogs, the rank unseemly growth, the unwholesome steaming earth Here and there, and frequently too, we encountered a solitary broken-down wagon, full of some new settler's goods It was a pitiful sight to see one of these vehicles deep in the mire, the axle-tree broken, the wheel lying idly by its side, the man gone miles away, to look for assistance, the woman seated among their wandering household gods with a baby at her breast, a picture of forlorn, dejected patience, the team of oxen crouching down mournfully in the mud, and breathing forth such clouds of vapour from their mouths and nostrils, that all the damp mist and fog around seemed to have come direct from them

In due time we mustered once again before the merchant tailor's, and having done so, crossed over to the city in the ferry-boat, passing, on the way, a spot called Bloody Island, the duelling-ground of St Louis, and so designated in honour of the last fatal combat fought there, which was with pistols, breast to breast. Both combatants fell dead upon the ground, and possibly some rational people may think of them, as of the gloomy madmen on the Monks' Mound, that they were no great loss to the community

RETURN TO CINCINNATI A STAGE-COACH RIDE FROM THAT CITY TO COLUMBUS, AND THENCE TO SANDUSKY SO, BY LAKE ERIE, TO THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

As I had a desire to travel through the interior of the State of Ohio, and to "strike the lakes," as the phrase is, at a small town called Sandusky, to which that route would conduct us on our way to Niagara, we had to return from St Louis by the way we had come, and to retrace our former track as far as Cincinnati

The day on which we were to take leave of St Louis being very fine, and the steamboat, which was to have started I don't know how early in the morning, postponing, for the third or fourth time, her departure until the afternoon, we rode forward to an old French village on the river, called properly Carondelet, and nicknamed Vide Poche, and arranged that the packet should call for us there

The place consisted of a few poor cottages, and two or three public-houses, the state of whose larders certainly seemed to justify the second designation of the village, for there was nothing to eat in any of them. At length, however, by going back some half a nule or so, we found a solitary house where ham and coffee were procurable, and there we tarried to await the advent of the boat, which would come in sight, from the green before the door, a long way off

It was a neat, unpretending village tavern, and we took our repast in a quaint little room with a bed in it, decorated with some old oil paintings, which in their time had probably done duty in a Catholic chapel or monastery. The fare was very good, and served with great cleanliness The house was kept by a characteristic old couple, with whom we had a long talk, and who were perhaps a very good sample of that kind of people in the West

The landlord was a dry, tough, hard-faced old fellow (not so very old either, for he was but just turned sixty, I should think), who had been out with the militia in the last war with England, and had seen all kinds of service—except a battle, and he had been very near seeing that, he added-very near He had all his life been restless and locomotive, with an irresistible desire for change, and was still the son of his old self, for if he had nothing to keep him at home, he said (slightly jerking his hat and his thumb towards the window of the room in which the old lady sat, as we stood talking in front of the house) he would clean up his musket and be off to Texas to morrow morning He was one of the very many descendants of Cain proper to this continent, who seem destined from their birth to serve as pioneers in the great human army, who gladly go on from year to year extending its outposts, and leaving home after home behind them, and die at last, utterly regardless of their graves being left thousands of miles behind by the wandering generation who succeed

His wife was a domesticated, kind-hearted old soul, who had come with him "from the queen city of the world," which, it seemed, was Philadelphia, but had no love for this Western country, and indeed had little reason to bear it any, having seen her children, one by one, die here of tever, in the full prime and beauty of their youth. Her heart was sore, she said, to think of them, and to talk on this theme, even to strangers, in that blighted place, so far from her old home, eased it somewhat, and became a melancholy pleasure

The boat appearing towards evening, we bade adieu to the poor old lady and her vagrant spouse, and making for the nearest landing-place, were soon on board the Messenger again, in our old cabin, and steaming down the Mississippi

If the coming up this river, slowly making head against the stream, be an irksome journey, the shooting down it with the turbid current is almost worse, for then the boat, proceeding at the rate of twelve or fifteen miles an hour, has to force its passage through a labyrinth of floating logs which, in the dark, it is often impossible to see beforehand or avoid that night the bell was never silent for five minutes at a time. and after every ring the vessel reeled again, sometimes beneath a single blow, sometimes beneath a dozen dealt in quick succession, the lightest of which seemed more than enough to beat in her frail keel as though it had been pie-crust ing down upon the filthy river after dark, it seemed to be alive with monsters, as these black masses rolled upon the surface. or came starting up again, head first, when the boat, in ploughing her way among a shoal of such obstructions, drove a few among them for the moment under water Sometimes the engine stopped during a long interval, and then before her and behind, and gathering close about her on all sides, were so many of these ill-favoured obstacles that she was fairly hemmed in-the centre of a floating island-and was constrained to pause until they parted, somewhere, as dark clouds will do before the wind, and opened by degrees a channel out

In good time next morning, however, we came again in sight of the detestable morass called Cairo, and stopping there to take in wood, lay alongside a barge, whose starting timbers scarcely held together It was moored to the bank. and on its side was painted "Coffee House," that being, I suppose, the floating paradise to which the people fly for shelter when they lose their houses for a month or two beneath the hideous waters of the Mississippi But looking southward from this point, we had the satisfaction of seeing that intolerable river dragging its slimy length and ugly freight abruptly off towards New Orleans, and passing a vellow line which stretched across the current, were again upon the clear Ohio, never, I trust, to see the Mississippi more, saving in troubled dreams and nightmares it for the company of its sparkling, neighbour, was like the transition from pain to ease, or the awakening from a horrible vision to cheerful realities

We arrived at Louisville on the fourth night, and gladly availed ourselves of its excellent hotel. Next day we went on in the Ben Franklin, a beautiful mail steamboat, and reached Cincinnati shortly after midnight. Being by this time nearly tired of sleeping upon shelves, we had remained awake to go ashore straightway, and groping a passage across the dark decks of other boats, and among labyrinths of engine-machinery and leaking casks of molasses, we reached the streets, knocked up the porter at the hotel where we had stayed before, and were, to our great joy, safely housed soon afterwards

We rested but one day at Cincinnati, and then resumed our journey to Sandusky. As it comprised two varieties of stage-coach travelling, which, with those I have already glanced at, comprehend the main characteristics of this mode of transit in America, I will take the reader as our fellow passenger, and pledge myself to perform the distance with all possible dispatch

Our place of destination in the first instance is Columbus It is distant about a hundred and twenty miles from Cincinnati, but there is a macadamized road (rare blessing!) the whole way, and the rate of travelling upon it is six miles

We start at eight o'clock in the morning, in a great mail-coach, whose huge cheeks are so very ruddy and plethoric, that it appears to be troubled with a tendency of blood to the head. Dropsical it certainly is, for it will hold a dozen passengers inside. But, wonderful to add, it is very clean and bright, being nearly new, and rattles through the streets of Cincinnati gaily.

Our way lies through a beautiful country, richly cultivated, and luxuriant in its promise of an abundant harvest. Sometimes we pass a field where the strong bristling stalks of Indian corn look like a crop of walking-sticks, and sometimes an enclosure where the green wheat is springing up among a labyrinth of stumps. The primitive worm-fence is universal, and an ugly thing it is, but the farms are neatly kept, and, save for these differences, one snight be travelling just now in Kent.

We often stop to water at a roadside inn, which is always dull and silent. The coachman dismounts and fills his bucket, and holds it to the horses' heads. There is scarcely ever any one to help him, there are seldom any loungers standing round, and never any stable company with jokes track. Sometimes, when we have changed our team, there is a difficulty in starting again, arising out of the prevalent mode of breaking a young horse, which is to catch him, harness him against his will, and put him in a stage-coach without further notice. But we get on somehow or other, after a great many kicks and a violent struggle, and jog on as before again.

Occasionally, when we stop to change, some two or three half-drunken loafers will come loitering out with their hands in their pockets, or will be seen kicking their heels in rocking-chairs, or lounging on the window-sill, or sitting on a rail within the colonnade. They have not often anything to say though, either to us or to each other, but sit there idly staring at the coach and horses. The landlord of the inn is usually among them, and seems, of all the party, to be the least connected with the business of the house. Indeed, he is with reference to the tavern, what the driver is in relation to the coach and passengers whatever happens in his sphere of action, he is quite indifferent, and perfectly easy in his mind.

The frequent change of coachmen works no change or variety in the coachman's character He is always dirty, sullen, and taciturn If he be capable of smartness of any kind, moral or physical, he has a faculty of concealing it which is truly marvellous He never speaks to you as you sit beside him on the box, and if you speak to him, he answers (if at all) in monosyllables He points out nothing on the road, and seldom looks at anything, being, to all appearance, thoroughly weary of it and of existence gener ally As to doing the honours of his coach, his business, as I have said, is with the horses The coach follows because it is attached to them and goes on wheels, not because you are in it Sometimes, towards the end of a long stage, he suddenly breaks out into a discordant fragment of an election song, but his face never sings along with him-it is only his voice, and not often that

He always chews and always spits, and never encumbers himself with a pocket-handkerchief. The consequences to the box passenger, especially when the wind blows towards him, are not agreeable

the inside passengers, or whenever any bystander addresses them, or any one among them, or they address each other, you will hear one phrase repeated over and over and over again to the most extraordinary extent. It is an ordinary and unpromising phrase enough, being neither more nor less than "Yes, sir," but it is adapted to every variety of circumstance, and fills up every pause in the conversation Thus —

The time is one o'clock at noon The scene, a place where we are to stay and dine, on this journey drives up to the door of an inn The day is warm, and there are several idlers lingering about the tavern, and waiting for the public dinner Among them is a stout gentleman in a brown hat, swinging himself to and fro in a rocking-chair on the pavement

(To the stout gentleman in the rocking-STRAW HAT chair) I reckon that's Judge Jefferson, an't it?

Brown Hat (Still swinging, speaking very slowly, and without any emotion whatever) Yes, sir

Brown Hat Yes, sır

STRAW HAT There was a snap of cold last week

Brown Hat Yes, sir STRAW HAT Yes, sir

A pause They look at each other very seriously

STRAW HAT I calculate you'll are got through that case of the corporation, Tudge, by this time, now?

Brown Hat Yes, sir

STRAW HAT How did the verdict go, sir?

(Interrogatively) Yes, sir? STRAW HAT

Brown Hat (Affirmatively) Yes, sir

BOTH. (Musingly, as each gazes down the street.) Yes, sir

They look at each other again, still more Another pause seriously than before.

Brown Hat This coach is rather behind its time to-day. I guess

STRAW HAT (Doubtingly) Yes, sir

BROWN HAT (Looking at his watch) Yes, sir, nigh upon two hours

STRAW HAT (Raising his eyebrows in very great surprise) Yes, sir !

(Decisively, as he puts up his watch) BROWN HAT Yes, sır

ALL THE OTHER INSIDE PASSENGERS (Among themselves) Yes, sir

COACHMAN (In a very surly tone) No, it an't STRAW HAT (To the coachman) Well, I don't know, We were a pretty tall time coming that last fifteen mile That's a fact

The coachman making no reply, and plainly declining to enter into any controversy on a subject so far removed from his sympathies and feelings, another passenger says, "Yes, sir," and the gentleman in the straw hat, in acknowledgment of his courtesy, says, "Yes, sir" to him in return The straw hat then inquires of the brown hat whether that coach in which he (the straw hat) then sits is not a new one? To which the brown hat again makes answer, "Yes, sir"

Brown Hat Yes, sir

ALL THE OTHER INSIDE PASSENGERS Yes, SIT

Brown Hat (To the company in general) Yes, sir

The conversational powers of the company having been by this time pretty beavily taxed, the straw hat opens the door and gets out, and all the rest alight also. We dine soon afterwards with the boarders in the house, and have nothing to drink but tea and coffee As they are both very bad, and the water is worse, I ask for brandy, but it is a Temperance Hotel, and spirits are not to be had for love or money This preposterous forcing of unpleasant drinks down the reluctant throats of travellers is not at all uncommon in America, but I never discovered that the scruples of such wincing landlords induced them to preserve any unusually nice balance between the quality of their fare and their scale of charges, on the contrary, I rather suspected them of diminishing the one and exalting the other, by way of recompense for the loss of their profit on the sale of spirituous liquors After all, perhaps, the plainest course for persons of such tender consciences would be a total abstinence from tavern-keeping

Dinner over, we get into another vehicle which is ready at the door (for the coach has been changed in the interval), and resume our journey, which continues through the same kind of country until evening, when we come to the town where we are to stop for tea and supper, and having delivered the mail bags at the post-office, ride through the usual wide street, lined with the usual stores and houses (the drapers always having hung up at their door, by way of sign, a piece of bright red cloth), to the hotel where this meal is prepared There being many boarders here, we sit down, a large party, and a very melancholy one, as usual. But there is a buxom hostess at the head of the table, and opposite, a simple Welsh schoolmaster with his wife and child, who came here, on a speculation of greater promise than performance, to teach the classics, and they are sufficient subjects of interest until the meal is over, and another coach In it we go on once more, lighted by a bright moon, until midnight, when we stop to change the coach again, and remain for half an hour or so in a miserable room, with a blurred lithograph of Washington over the smoky fireplace, and a mighty jug of cold water on the table, to which refreshment the moody passengers do so apply themselves, that they would seem to be, one and all, keen patients of Dr Sangrado Among them is a very little boy, who chews tobacco like a very big one, and a droning gentleman, who talks arithmetically and statistically on all subjects, from poetry downwards, and who always speaks in the same key, with exactly the same emphasis, and with very grave deliberation He came outside just now, and told me how that the uncle of a certain young lady who had been spirited away and married by a certain captain, lived in these parts, and how this uncle was so valiant and ferocious that he shouldn't wonder if he were to follow the said captain to England, "and shoot him down in the street wherever he found him," in the feasibility of which strong measure I, being for the moment rather prone to contradiction, from feeling half asleep and very tired, declined to acquiesce-assuring him that if the uncle did resort to it, or gratified any other little whim of the like nature, he would find himself one morning prematurely throttled at the Old Bailey, and that he would do well to make his will before he went, as he would certainly want it before he had been in Britain very long

On we go, all night, and by-and-by the day begins to break. and presently the first cheerful rays of the warm sun come slanting on us brightly It sheds its light upon a miserable waste of sodden grass, and dull trees, and squalid huts, whose aspect is forlorn and grievous in the last degree A very desert in the wood, whose growth of green is dank and noxious like that upon the top of standing water-where poisonous fungus grows in the rare footprint on the oozy ground, and sprouts like witches' coral from the crevices in the cabin wall and floor-it is a hideous thing to lie upon the very threshold of a city But it was purchased years ago, and as the owner cannot be discovered, the State has been unable to reclaim it So there it remains, in the midst of cultivation and improvement, like ground accursed. and made obscene and rank by some great crime

We reached Columbus shortly before seven o'clock, and stayed there, to refresh, that day and night, having excellent apartments in a very large unfinished hotel called the Neill House, which were richly fitted with the polished wood of the black walnut, and opened on a handsome portico and stone veranda, like rooms in some Italian mansion The town is clean and pretty, and of course is "going to be" much larger It is the seat of the State legislature of Ohio. and lays claim, in consequence, to some consideration and

There being no stage coach next day upon the road we wished to take, I hired "an extra," at a reasonable charge, to carry us to Tiffin—a small town from whence there is a railroad to Sandusky This extra was an ordinary four-horse stage-coach, such as I have described, changing horses and drivers, as the stage-coach would, but was exclusively our own for the journey To ensure our having horses at the proper stations, and being incommoded by no strangers, the proprietors sent an agent on the box, who was to accompany us the whole way through, and thus attended, and bearing with us, besides, a hamper full of savoury cold meats, and fruit, and wine, we started off again in high spirits, at half-past six o'clock next morning, very much delighted to be by ourselves, and disposed to enjoy even the roughest journey

It was well for us that we were in this humour, for the road we went over that day was certainly enough to have shaken tempers that were not resolutely at Set Fair, down to some inches below Stormy At one time we were all flung together in a heap at the bottom of the coach, and at another we were crushing our heads against the roof Now, one side was down deep in the mire, and we were holding on to the Now, the coach was lying on the tails of the two wheelers, and now it was rearing up in the air, in a frantic state, with all four horses standing on the top of an insurmountable eminence, looking coolly back at it, as though they would say, "Unharness us It can't be done" The drivers on these roads, who certainly get over the ground in a manner which is quite miraculous, so twist and turn the team about in forcing a passage, corkscrew fashion, through the bogs and swamps, that it was quite a common circum stance, on looking out of the window, to see the coachman with the ends of a pair of reins in his hands, apparently driving nothing, or playing at horses, and the leaders staring at one unexpectedly from the back of the coach, as if they had some idea of getting up behind A great portion of the way was over what is called a corduroy road, which is made by throwing trunks of trees into a marsh, and leaving them to settle there The very slightest of the jolts with which the ponderous carriage fell from log to log was enough, it seemed, to have dislocated all the bones in the human body would be impossible to experience a similar set of sensations, in any other circumstances, unless perhaps in attempting to go up to the top of St Paul's in an omnibus. Never, never once, that day, was the coach in any position, attitude, or kind of motion to which we are accustomed in coaches Never did it make the smallest approach to one's experience of the proceedings of any sort of vehicle that goes on wheels

Still, it was a fine day, and the temperature was delicious, and though we had left Summer behind us in the west, and were fast leaving Spring, we were moving towards Niagara and home We alighted in a pleasant wood towards the middle of the day, dined on a fallen tree, and leaving our best fragments with a cottager, and our worst with the pigs (who swarm in this part of the country like grains of sand on the sea-shore, to the great comfort of our commissariat in Canada), we went forward again, gaily

As night came on, the track grew narrower and narrower, until at last it so lost itself among the trees, that the driver seemed to find his way by instinct. We had the comfort of knowing, at least, that there was no danger of his falling asleep, for every now and then a wheel would strike against an unseen stump with such a jerk, that he was fain to hold on pretty tight and pretty quick, to keep himself upon the box. Nor was there any reason to dread the least danger from furious driving, inasmuch as over that broken ground the horses had enough to do to walk, as to shying, there was no room for that, and a herd of wild elephants could not have run away in such a wood, with such a coach at their heels. So we stumbled along, quite satisfied

These stumps of trees are a curious feature in American travelling. The varying illusions they present to the un accustomed eye as it grows dark, are quite astonishing in their number and reality. Now there is a Grecian urn erected in the centre of a lonely field, now there is a woman weeping at a tomb, now a very commonplace old gentleman in a white waistcoat, with a thumb thrust into each armhole of his coat, now a student poring on a book, now a crouching negro, now a horse, a dog, a cannon, an armed man, a hunchback throwing off his cloak and stepping forth into the light. They were often as entertaining to me as so many glasses in a magic-lantern, and never took their shapes at my bidding, but seemed to force themselves upon me, whether I would or no, and strange to say, I sometimes recognized in them counterparts of figures once familiar to me in pictures attached to childish books, forgotten long ago

It soon became too dark, however, even for this amusement, and the trees were so close together that their dry branches rattled against the coach on either side, and obliged us all to keep our heads within It lightened too for three whole hours, each flash being very bright, and blue, and

long, and as the vivid streaks came darting in among the crowded branches, and the thunder rolled gloomily above the tree-tops, one could scarcely help thinking that there were better neighbourhoods at such a time than thick woods afforded

At length, between ten and eleven o'clock at night, a few feeble lights appeared in the distance, and Upper Sandusky, an Indian village, where we were to stay till morning, lay before us

They were gone to bed at the log inn, which was the only house of entertainment in the place, but soon answered to our knocking, and got some tea for us in a sort of kitchen or common room, tapestried with old newspapers pasted against The bedchamber to which my wife and I were shown was a large, low, ghostly room, with a quantity of withered branches on the hearth, and two doors without any fastening, opposite to each other, both opening on the black night and wild country, and so contrived that one of them always blew the other open-a novelty in domestic architecture which I do not remember to have seen before, and which I was somewhat disconcerted to have forced on my attention after getting into bed, as I had a considerable sum in gold for our travelling expenses, in my dressing-case. Some of the luggage, however, piled against the panels soon settled this difficulty, and my sleep would not have been very much affected that night, I believe, though it had failed to do so

My Boston friend climbed up to bed somewhere in the roof, where another guest was already snoring hugely. But being bitten beyond his power of endurance, he turned out again, and fled for shelter to the coach, which was airing itself in front of the house. This was not a very politic step, as it turned out, for the pigs scenting him, and looking upon the coach as a kind of pie with some manner of meat inside, grunted round it so hideously, that he was afraid to come out again, and lay there shivering till morning. Nor was it possible to warm him, when he did come out, by means of a glass of brandy, for in Indian villages, the legislature, with a very good and wise intention, forbids the sale of spirits by tavern-keepers. The precaution, however, is quite inefficacious, for the Indians never fail to procure liquor of a worse kind, at a dearer price, from travelling

It is a settlement of the Wyandot Indians who inhabit this place Among the company at breakfast was a mild old gentleman, who had been for many years employed by the United States Government in conducting negotiations with the Indians, and who had just concluded a treaty with these people by which they bound themselves, in consideration of a certain annual sum, to remove next year to some land provided for them west of the Mississippi, and a little way beyond St Louis He gave me a moving account of their strong attachment to the familiar scenes of their infancy, and in particular to the burial-places of their kindred, and of their great reluctance to leave them He had witnessed many such removals, and always with pain, though he knew that they departed for their own good The question whether this tribe should go or stay had been discussed among them a day or two before, in a hut erected for the purpose, the logs of which still lay upon the ground before the inn When the speaking was done, the ayes and noes were ranged on opposite sides, and every male adult voted in his turn The moment the result was known, the minority (a large one) cheerfully yielded to the rest, and withdrew all kind of opposition

We met some of these poor Indians afterwards, riding on shaggy pomes They were so like the meaner sort of gipsies, that if I could have seen any of them in England, I should have concluded, as a matter of course, that they belonged to that wandering and restless people

Leaving this town directly after breakfast, we pushed forward again, over a rather worse road than yesterday, if possible, and arrived about noon at Tiffin, where we parted with the extra. At two o'clock we took the railroad—the travelling on which was very slow, its construction being indifferent, and the ground wet and marshy—and arrived at Sandusky in time to dine that evening We put up at a comfortable little hotel on the brink of Lake Erie, lay there that night, and had no choice but to wait there next day, until a steamboat bound for Buffalo appeared The town, which was sluggish and uninteresting enough, was something like the back of an English watering-place, out of the season

Our host, who was very attentive and anxious to make us comfortable, was a handsome, middle aged man, who had comfortable, was a handsome, middle aged man, who had come to this town from New England, in which part of the country he was "raised" When I say that he constantly walked in and out of the room with his hat on, and stopped to converse in the same free-and-easy state, and lay down on our sofa, and pulled his newspaper out of his pocket, and read it at his ease, I merely mention these traits as characteristic of the country, not at all as being matter of com plaint, or as having been disagreeable to me I should undoubtedly be offended by such proceedings at home, because there they are not the custom, and where they are not they would be impertinencies, but in America, the only desire of a good-natured fellow of this kind is to treat his guests hospitably and well, and I had no more right, and I can truly say no more disposition, to measure his conduct by our English rule and standard, than I had to quarrel with him for not being of the exact stature which would qualify him for admission into the Queen's Grenadier Guards As little inclination had I to find fault with a funny old lady who was an upper domestic in this establishment, and who, when she came to wait upon us at any meal, sat herself down comfortably in the most convenient chair, and producing a large pin to pick her teeth with, remained performing that ceremony, and steadfastly regarding us mean-while with much gravity and composure (now and then pressing us to eat a little more), until it was time to clear away It was enough for us, that whatever we wished done was done with great civility and readiness, and a desire to oblige, not only here, but everywhere else, and that all our wants were, in general, zealously anticipated

We were taking an early dinner at this house, on the day after our arrival, which was Sunday, when a steamboat came in sight, and presently touched at the wharf As she proved to be on her way to Buffalo, we hurned on board with all speed, and soon left Sandusky far behind us

She was a large vessel of five hundred tons, and handsomely fitted up, though with high-pressure engines, which always conveyed that kind of feeling to me which I should be likely to experience, I think, if I had lodgings on the first-floor of a powder mill She was laden with flour, some casks of which commodity were stored upon the deck. The captain coming up to have a little conversation, and to introduce a friend, seated himself astride of one of these barrels, like a Bacchus of private life, and pulling a great clasp-knife out of his pocket, began to "whittle" it as he talked, by paring thin slices off the edges. And he whittled with such industry and hearty good-will, that but for his being called away very soon, it must have disappeared bodily, and left nothing in its place but grist and shavings

After calling at one or two flat places, with low dams stretching out into the lake, whereon were stumpy light-houses, like windmills without sails, the whole looking like a Dutch vignette, we came at midnight to Cleveland, where we lay all night, and until nine o'clock next morning

I entertained quite a curiosity in reference to this place, from having seen at Sandusky a specimen of its literature in the shape of a newspaper, which was very strong indeed upon the subject of Lord Ashburton's recent arrival at Washington to adjust the points in dispute between the United States Government and Great Britain-informing its readers that as America had "whipped" England in her infancy, and whipped her again in her youth, so it was clearly necessary that she must whip her once again in her maturity, and pledging its credit to all True Americans, that if Mr Webster did his duty in the approaching negotiations, and sent the English Lord home again in double-quick time, they should, within two years, sing "Yankee Doodle in Hyde Park, and Hail Columbia in the scarlet courts of Westminster!" I found it a pretty town, and had the satisfaction of beholding the outside of the office of the journal from which I have just quoted I did not enjoy the delight of seeing the wit who indited the paragraph in question, but I have no doubt he is a prodigious man in his way, and held in high repute by a select circle.

There was a gentleman on board, to whom, as I unintentionally learned through the thin partition which divided our state-room from the cabin in which he and his wife conversed together, I was unwittingly the occasion of very great uneasi ness I don't know why or wherefore, but I appeared to run in his mind perpetually, and to dissatisfy him very much First of all I heard him say—and the most ludicrous part of the business was, that he said it in my very ear, and could not have communicated more directly with me if he had leaned upon my shoulder and whispered me-"Boz is on board still, my dear" After a considerable pause, he added complainingly, "Boz keeps himself very close," which was true enough, for I was not very well, and was lying down, with a book I thought he had done with me after this, but I was deceived, for a long interval having elapsed, during which I imagine him to have been turning restlessly from side to side, and trying to go to sleep, he broke out again with, "I suppose that Boz will be writing a book byand-by, and putting all our names in it!" at which imagi nary consequence of being on board a boat with Boz, he groaned, and became silent

We called at the town of Erie, at eight o'clock that night, and lay there an hour Between five and six next morning, we arrived at Buffalo, where we breakfasted, and being too near the Great Falls to wait patiently anywhere else, we set off by the train, the same morning at nine o'clock, to

It was a miserable day, chilly and raw, a damp mist falling, and the trees in that northern region quite bare and wintry. Whenever the train halted, I listened for the roar, and was constantly straining my eyes in the direction where I knew the Falls must be, from seeing the river rolling on towards them, every moment expecting to behold the spray. Within a few minutes of our stopping, not before, I saw two great white clouds rising up slowly and majestically from the depths of the earth. That was all. At length we alighted, and then, for the first time, I fleard the mighty rush of water, and felt the ground tremble underneath my feet.

The bank is very steep, and was slippery with rain and half-melted ice. I hardly know how I got down, but I was soon at the bottom, and climbing, with two English officers who were crossing, and had joined me, over some broken rocks, deafened by the noise, half-blinded by the spray, and wet to the skin. We were at the foot of the American Fall I could see an immense torrent of water tearing headlong down from some great height, but had no idea of shape, or situation, or anything but vague immensity

When we were seated in the little ferry-boat, and were crossing the swollen river immediately before both cataracts, I began to feel what it was, but I was in a manner stunned, and unable to comprehend the vastness of the scene It was not until I came on Table Rock, and looked—Great Heaven, on what a fall of bright-green water !—that it came upon me in its full might and majesty

Then, when I felt how near to my Creator I was standing, the first effect, and the enduring one—instant and lasting—of the tremendous spectacle, was Peace Peace of Mind, tranquillity, calm recollections of the Dead, great thoughts of Eternal Rest and Happiness—nothing of gloom or terror Niagara was at once stamped upon my heart, an Image of Beauty, to remain there, changeless and indelible, until its

pulses cease to beat, for ever

Oh, how the strife and trouble of daily life receded from my view, and lessened in the distance, during the ten memorable days we passed on that Enchanted Ground! What voices spoke from out the thundering water, what faces, faded from the earth, looked out upon me from its gleaming depths, what Heavenly promise glistened in those angels' tears, the drops of many hues, that showered around, and twined themselves about the gorgeous arches which the changing rainbows made!

I never stirred in all that time from the Canadian side, whither I had gone at first I never crossed the river again, for I knew there were people on the other shore, and in such a place it is natural to shun strange company. To wander to and fro all day, and see the cataracts from all points of view, to stand upon the edge of the great Horse Shoe Fall, marking the hurried water gathering strength as it approached the verge, yet seeming, too, to pause before it shot into the gulf below, to gaze from the river's level up at the torrent as it came streaming down, to climb the neighbouring heights and watch it through the trees, and see the wreathing water in the rapids hurrying on to take its fearful plunge, to linger in the shadow of the solemn rocks three miles below, watching the river as, stirred by no visible cause, it heaved and eddied and awoke the echoes, being troubled yet, far down beneath the surface, by its giant leap, to have Niagara before me, lighted by the sun and by the moon, red in the day's decline, and grey as evening slowly fell upon it, to look upon it every day, and wake up in the night and hear its ceaseless voice this was enough

I think in every quiet season now, still do those waters roll and leap, and roar and tumble, all day long, still are the rainbows spanning them, a hundred feet below. Still, when the sun is on them, do they shine and glow like molten gold. Still, when the day is gloomy, do they fall like snow, or seem to crumble away like the front of a great chalk cliff, or roll down the rock like dense white smoke. But always does the mighty stream appear to die as it comes down, and always from its unfathomable grave arises that tremendous ghost of spray and mist which is never laid, which has haunted this place with the same dread solemnity since Darkness brooded on the deep, and that first flood before the Deluge—Light—came rushing on Creation at the word of God.

CHAPTER XV

IN CANADA TORONTO, KINGSTQN, MONTREAL, QUEBEC, ST JOHN'S IN THE UNITED STATES AGAIN LEBANON, THE SHAKER VILLAGE, WEST POINT

I wish to abstain from instituting any comparison, or drawing any parallel whatever, between the social features of the United States and those of the British Possessions in Canada. For this reason, I shall confine myself to a very brief account of our journeyings in the latter territory

But before I leave Niagara, I must advert to one disgusting circumstance, which can hardly have escaped the observation of any decent traveller who has visited the Falls

On Table Rock there is a cottage belonging to a Guide, where little relics of the place are sold, and where visitors register their names in a book kept for the purpose. On the wall of the room in which a great many of these volumes are preserved, the following request is posted "Visitors will please not copy nor extract the remarks and poetical effusions from the registers and albums kept here"

But for this intimation, I should have let them lie upon the tables on which they were strewn with careful negligence, like books in a drawing room, being quite satisfied with the stupendous silliness of certain stanzas with an anti-climax at the end of each, which were framed and hung up on the wall Curious, however, after reading this announcement, to see what kind of morsels were so carefully preserved, I turned a few leaves, and found them scrawled all over with the vilest and the filthiest ribaldry that ever human hogs delighted in

It is humiliating enough to know that there are among men brutes so obscene and worthless that they can delight in laying their miserable profanations upon the very steps of Nature's greatest altar, but that these should be hoarded up for the delight of their fellow-swine, and kept in a public place where any eyes may see them, is a disgrace to the English language in which they are written (though I hope few of these entries have been made by Englishmen), and a reproach to the English side, on which they are preserved

The quarters of our soldiers at Niagara are finely and airly situated. Some of them are large detached houses on the plain above the Falls, which were originally designed for hotels, and in the evening time, when the women and children were leaning over the balconies watching the men as they played at ball and other games upon the grass before the door, they often presented a little picture of cheerfulness and animation which made it quite a pleasure to pass that

At any garrisoned point where the line of demarcation between one country and another is so very narrow as at Niagara, desertion from the ranks can scarcely fail to be of frequent occurrence, and it may be reasonably supposed that when the soldiers entertain the wildest and maddest hopes of the fortune and independence that await them on the other side, the impulse to play traitor, which such a place suggests to dishonest minds, is not weakened. But it very rarely happens that the men who do desert are happy or contented afterwards, and many instances have been known in which they have confessed their grievous disappointment, and their earnest desire to return to their old service if they could but be assured of pardon, or of lenient treatment Many of their comrades, notwithstanding, do the like, from time to time, and instances of loss of life in the effort to cross the river with this object are far from being uncommon. Several men were drowned in the attempt to swim across, not long ago, and one, who had the madness to trust himself upon a table as a raft, was swept down to the whirlpool, where his mangled body eddied round and round some days

I am inclined to think that the noise of the Falls is very much exaggerated, and this will appear the more probable when the depth of the great basin in which the water is received is taken into account. At no time during our stay there was the wind at all high or boisterous, but we never heard them three miles off, even at the very quiet time of

Queenston, at which place the steamboats start for Toronto (or I should rather say at which place they call, for their wharf is at Lewiston, on the opposite shore), is situated in a delicious valley, through which the Niagara River, in colour a very deep green, pursues its course. It is approached by a road that takes its winding way among the heights by which the town is sheltered, and seen from this point, is extremely beautiful and picturesque. On the most conspicuous of these heights stood a monument erected by the Provincial Legislature in memory of General Brock, who was slain in a battle with the American forces, after having won the victory Some vagabond, supposed to be a fellow of the name of Lett, who is now, or who lately was, in prison as a felon, blew up this monument two years ago, and it is now a melancholy ruin, with a long fragment of iron railing hanging dejectedly from its top, and waving to and fro like a wild ivy branch or broken vine stem. It is of much higher importance than it may seem that this statue should be repaired at the public cost, as it ought to have been long ago Firstly, because it is beneath the dignity of England to allow a memorial raised in honour of one of her defenders to remain in this condition, on the very spot where he died.

Secondly, because the sight of it in its present state, and the recollection of the unpunished outrage which brought it to this pass, is not very likely to soothe down border feelings among English subjects here, or compose their border quarrels and dislikes

I was standing on the wharf at this place, watching the passengers embarking in a steamboat which preceded that whose coming we awaited, and participating in the anxiety with which a sergeant's wife was collecting her few goods together—keeping one distracted eye hard upon the porters who were hurrying them on board, and the other on a hoopless washing-tub, for which, as being the most utterly worthless of all her movables, she seemed to entertain particular affection—when three or four soldiers with a recruit came up and went on board

The recruit was a likely young fellow enough, strongly built and well made, but by no means sober, indeed he had all the air of a man who had been more or less drunk for some days. He carried a small bundle over his shoulder, slung at the end of a walking-stick, and had a short pipe in his mouth. He was as dusty and dirty as recruits usually are, and his shoes betokened that he had travelled on foot some distance, but he was in a very jocose state, and shook hands with this soldier, and clapped that one on the back, and talked and laughed continually, like a roaring idle dog as he was

The soldiers rather laughed at this blade than with him—seeming to say, as they stood straightening their canes in their hands, and looking coolly at him over their glazed stocks, "Go on, my boy, while you may, you'll know better by and-by "—when suddenly the novice, who had been backing towards the gangway in his noisy merriment, fell overboard before their eyes, and splashed heavily down into the river between the vessel and the dock.

I never saw such a good thing as the change that came over these soldiers in an instant. Almost before the man was down, their professional manner, their stiffness and constraint, were gone, and they were filled with the most violent energy. In less time than is required to tell it they had him out again, feet first, with the tails of his coat flapping over his eyes, everything about him hanging the wrong way.

and the water streaming off at every thread in his threadbare dress. But the moment they set him upright, and found that he was none the worse, they were soldiers again, looking over their glazed stocks more composedly than ever

The half-sobered recruit glanced round for a moment, as if his first impulse were to express some gratitude for his preservation, but seeing them with this air of total unconcern, and having his wet pipe presented to him with an oath by the soldier who had been by far the most anxious of the party, he stuck it in his mouth, thrust his hands into his moist pockets, and without even shaking the water off his clothes, walked on board whistling—not to say as if nothing had happened, but as if he had meant to do it, and it had been a perfect success

Our steamboat came up directly this had left the wharf, and soon bore us to the mouth of the Niagara, where the Stars and Stripes of America flutter on one side, and the Union Jack of England on the other, and so narrow is the space between them, that the sentinels in either fort can often hear the watchword of the other country given Thence we emerged on Lake Ontario, an inland sea, and by half-past six o'clock were at Toronto

The country round this town being very flat is bare of scenic interest, but the town itself is full of life and motion, bustle, business, and improvement. The streets are well paved, and lighted with gas, the houses are large and good, the shops excellent. Many of them have a display of goods in their windows such as may be seen in thriving county towns in England, and there are some which would do no discredit to the metropolis itself. There is a good stone prison here, and there are, besides, a handsome church, a court-house, public offices, many commodious private residences, and a Government observatory for noting and recording the magnetic variations. In the College of Upper Canada, which is one of the public establishments of the city, a sound education in every department of polite learning can be had at a very moderate expense, the annual charge for the instruction of each pupil not exceeding nine pounds sterling. It has pretty good endowments in the way of land, affid is a valuable and useful institution.

The first stone of a new college had been laid but a few days before, by the Governor-General It will be a hand-some, spacious edifice, approached by a long avenue, which is already planted and made available as a public walk. The town is well adapted for wholesome exercise at all seasons, for the footways in the thoroughfares which lie beyond the principal street are planked like floors, and kept in very good and clean repair.

It is a matter of deep regret that political differences should have run high in this place, and led to most discreditable and disgraceful results. It is not long since guns were discharged from a window in this town at the successful candidates in an election, and the coachman of one of them was actually shot in the body, though not dangerously wounded. But one man was killed on the same occasion, and from the very window whence he received his death, the very flag which shielded his murderer (not only in the commission of his crime, but from its consequences), was displayed again on the occasion of the public ceremony performed by the Governor-General to which I have just adverted. Of all the colours in the rainbow, there is but one which could be so employed. I need not say that flag was orange.

The time of leaving Toronto for Kingston is noon By eight o'clock next morning the traveller is at the end of his journey, which is performed by steamboat upon Lake Ontario, calling at Port Hope and Coburg, the latter a cheerful, thriving little town Vast quantities of flour form the chief item in the freight of these vessels. We had no fewer than one thousand and eighty barrels on board, between Coburg and Kingston

The latter place, which is now the seat of government in Canada, is a very poor towr, rendered still poorer in the appearance of its market-place by the ravages of a recent fire Indeed, it may be said of Kingston, that one half of it appears to be burnt down, and the other half not to be built up. The Government House is neither elegant nor commodious, yet it is almost the only house of any importance in the neighbourhood.

There is an admirable jail here, well and wisely governed.

and excellently regulated in every respect. The men were employed as shoemakers, ropemakers, blacksmiths, failors, carpenters, and stone-cutters, and in building a new prison, which was pretty far advanced towards completion female prisoners were occupied in needlework them was a beautiful girl of twenty, who had been there nearly three years She acted as bearer of secret dispatches for the self-styled Patriots on Navy Island, during the Canadian insurrection-sometimes dressing as a girl, and carrying them in her stays, sometimes attiring herself as a boy. and secreting them in the lining of her hat In the latter character she always rode as a boy would, which was nothing to her, for she could govern any horse that any man could ride, and could drive four-in-hand with the best whip in those parts Setting forth on one of her patriotic missions, she appropriated to herself the first horse she could lay her hands on, and this offence had brought her where I saw her had quite a lovely face, though, as the reader may suppose from this sketch of her history, there was a lurking devil in her bright eye, which looked out pretty sharply from between her prison bars

There is a bomb-proof fort here of great strength, which occupies a bold position, and is capable, doubtless, of doing good service, though the town is much too close upon the frontier to be long held, I should imagine, for its present purpose in troubled times. There is also a small navy-yard, where a couple of Government steamboats were building, and

We left Kingston for Montreal on the tenth of May, at half-past nine in the morning, and proceeded in a steamboat down the St. Lawrence River The beauty of this noble stream at almost any point, but especially in the commencement of this journey, when it winds its way among the Thousand Islands, can hardly be imagined. The number and constant successions of these islands, all green and richly wooded, their fluctuating sizes, some so large that for half an hour together one among them will appear as the opposite bank of the river, and some so small that they are mere dimples on its broad bosom, their infinite variety of shapes; and the numberless combinations of beautiful forms which the trees growing on them present, all form a picture fraught with uncommon interest and pleasure

In the afternoon we shot down some rapids, where the river boiled and bubbled strangely, and where the force and headlong violence of the current were tremendous. At seven o'clock we reached Dickenson's Landing, whence travellers proceed for two or three hours by stage coach, the navigation of the river being rendered so dangerous and difficult in the interval, by rapids, that steamboats do not make the passage. The number and length of those portages, over which the roads are bad and the travelling slow, render the way between the towns of Montreal and Kingston somewhat tedious

Our course lay over a wide, unenclosed tract of country, at a little distance from the river side, whence the bright warning lights on the dangerous parts of the St Lawrence shone vividly The night was dark and raw, and the way dreary enough It was nearly ten o'clock when we reached the wharf where the next steamboat lay, and went on board, and to bed

She lay there all night, and started as soon as it was day. The morning was ushered in by a violent thunderstorm, and was very wet, but gradually improved and brightened up. Going on deck after breakfast, I was amazed to see floating down with the stream a most gigantic raft, with some thirty or forty wooden houses upon it, and at least as many flag-masts, so that it looked like a nautical street. I saw many of these rafts afterwards, but never one so large. All the timber, or "lumber," as it is called in America, which is brought down the St. Lawrence, is floated down in this manner. When the raft reaches its place of destination, it is broken up, the materials are sold, and the boatmen return for more

At eight we landed again, and travelled by a stage-coach for four hours through a pleasant and well cultivated country, perfectly French in every respect—in the appearance of the cottages, the air, language, and dress of the peasantry, the signboards on the shops and taverns, and the Virgin's shrines and crosses by the wayside Nearly every common labourer and boy, though he had no shoes to his feet, wore round his waist a sash of some bright colour, generally red, and the women, who were working in the fields and gardens, and doing all kinds of husbandry, wore, one and all, great flat straw hats with most capacious brims. There were Catholic priests and Sisters of Charity in the village streets, and images of the Saviour at the corners of cross-roads, and in other public places.

At noon we went on board another steamboat, and reached the village of Lachine, nine miles from Montreal, by three o'clock There we left the river, and went on by land

Montreal is pleasantly situated on the margin of the St Lawrence, and is backed by some bold heights, about which there are charming rides and drives. The streets are generally narrow and irregular, as in most French towns of any age, but in the more modern parts of the city they are wide and airy. They display a great variety of very good shops, and both in the town and suburbs there are many excellent private dwellings. The granite quays are remarkable for their beauty, solidity, and extent

There is a very large Catholic cathedral here, recently erected, with two tall spires, of which one is yet unfinished. In the open space, in front of this edifice, stands a solitary, grim-looking square brick tower, which has a quaint and remarkable appearance, and which the wiseacres of the place have consequently determined to pull down immediately. The Government House is very superior to that at Kingston, and the town is full of life and bustle. In one of the suburbs is a plank road—not footpath—five or six miles long, and a famous road it is too. All the rides in the vicinity were made doubly interesting by the bursting out of spring, which is here so rapid that it is but a day's leap from barren winter to the blooming youth of summer

The steamboats to Quebec perform the journey in the might—that is to say, they leave Montreal at six in the evening, and arrive at Quebec at six next morning. We made this excursion during our stay in Montreal (which exceeded a fortnight), and were charmed by its interest and beauty

The impression made upon the visitor by this Gibraltar of America—its giddy heights, its citadel suspended, as it were, in the air, its picturesque steep streets and frowning gateways, and the splendid views which burst upon the eye at every turn—is at once unique and lasting

It, is a place not to be forgotten or mixed up in the mind with other places, or altered for a moment in the crowd of scenes a traveller can recall. Apart from the realities of this most picturesque city, there are associations clustering about it which would make a desert rich in interest. The dangerous precipice, along whose rocky front Wolfe and his brave companions climbed to glory, the Plains of Abraham, where he received his mortal wound, the fortress so chivalrously defended by Montcalm, and his soldier's grave, dug for him while yet alive by the bursting of a shell, are not the least among them, or among the gallant incidents of history. That is a noble Monument, too, and worthy of two great nations, which perpetuates the memory of both brave generals, and on which their names are jointly written.

The city is rich in public institutions and in Catholic churches and charities, but it is mainly in the prospect from the site of the Old Government House, and from the Citadel, that its surpassing beauty lies The exquisite expanse of country, rich in field and forest, mountain-height and water, which lies stretched out before the view, with miles of Canadian villages, glancing in long white streaks, like veins along the landscape, the motley crowd of gables, roofs, and chimney-tops in the old hilly town immediately at hand, the beautiful St Lawrence sparkling and flashing in the sunlight, and the tiny ships below the rock from which you gaze, whose distant rigging looks like spiders' webs against the light, while casks and barrels on their decks dwindle into toys, and busy mariners become so many puppets,—all this, framed by a sunken window in the fortress and looked at from the shadowed room within, forms one of the brightest and most enchanting pictures that the eve can rest upon

In the spring of the year vast numbers of emigrants, who have newly arrived from England or from Ireland, pass between Quebec and Montreal on their way to the backwoods and new settlements of Canada If it be an entertaining lounge (as I very often found it) to take a morning stroll upon the quay at Montreal, and see them grouped in hundreds on the public wharves about their chests and boxes, it is matter of deep interest to be their fellow-passenger on

The vessel in which we returned from Quebec to Mon treal was crowded with them, and at night they spread their beds between decks (those who had beds, at least), and slept so close and thick about our cabin door that the passage to and fro was quite blocked up. They were nearly all English—from Gloucestershire the greater part—and had had a long winter passage out, but it was wonderful to see how clean the children had been kept, and how untiring in their love and self denial all the poor parents were

Cant as we may, and as we shall to the end of all things. it is very much harder for the poor to be virtuous than it is for the rich, and the good that is in them shines the brighter In many a noble mansion lives a man, the best of husbands and of fathers, whose private worth in both capacities is justly lauded to the skies. But bring him here. upon this crowded deck Strip from his fair young wife her silken dress and jewels, unbind her braided hair, stamp early wrinkles on her brow, pinch her pale cheek with care and much privation, array her faded form in coarsely-patched attire, let there be nothing but his love to set her forth or deck her out, and you shall put it to the proof indeed change his station in the world that he shall see in those young things who climb about his knee, not records of his wealth and name, but little wrestlers with him for his daily bread, so many poachers on his scanty meal, so many units to divide his every sum of comfort, and further to reduce its small amount. In lieu of the endearments of childhood in its sweetest aspect, heap upon him all its pains and wants, its sicknesses and ills, its fretfulness, caprice, and querulous endurance, let its prattle be not of engaging infant fancies, but of cold, and thirst, and hunger and if his fatherly affection outlive all this, and he be patient, watchful, tender, careful of his children's lives, and mindful always of their joys and sorrows, then send him back to Parliament, and Pulpit, and to Quarter Sessions, and when he hears fine alk of the depravity of those who live from hand to mouth, and labour hard to do it, let him speak up, as one who knows, and tell those holders forth that they, by parallel with such a class, should be High Angels in their daily lives, and lay but humble siege to heaven at last.

Which of us shall say what he would be, if such realities, with small relief or change all through his days, were his? Looking round upon these people—far from home, houseless, indigent, wandering, weary with travel and hard living—and seeing how patiently they nursed and tended their young children, how they consulted ever their wants first, then half supplied their own, what gentle ministers of hope and faith the women were, how the men profited by their example, and how very, very seldom even a moment's petulance or harsh complaint broke out among them, I felt a stronger love and honour of my kind come glowing on my heart, and wished to God there had been many atheists in the better part of human nature there to read this simple lesson in the book of Life

We left Montreal for New York again on the thirtieth of May, crossing to La Prairie, on the opposite shore of the St Lawrence, in a steamboat We then took the railroad to St John's, which is on the brink of Lake Champlain Our last greeting in Canada was from the English officers in the pleasant barracks at that place (a class of gentlemen who had made every hour of our visit memorable by their hospitality and friendship), and, with "Rule Britannia" sounding in our ears, soon left it far behind

But Canada has held, and always will retain, a foremost place in my remembrance. Few Englishmen are prepared to find it what it is. Advancing quietly, old differences settling down, and being fast forgotten, public feeling and private enterprise alike in a sound and wholesome state, nothing of flush or fever in its system, but health and vigour throbbing in its steady pulse, at is full of hope and promise. To me—who had been accustomed to think of it as something left behind in the strides of advancing society, as something neglected and forgotten, slumbering and wasting in its sleep—the demand for labour and the rates of wages, the busy quays of Montreal, the vessels taking in their cargoes, and discharging them, the amount of shipping in the different ports, the commerce, roads, and public works, all made to last, the respectability and character of the public journals, and the amount of rational comfort and happiness which honest industry may earn, were very great surprises. The steamboats on the lakes, in their conveniences, cleanly ness, and safety, in the gentlemanly character and bearing of their captains, and in the politeness and perfect comfort of their social regulations, are unsurpassed even by the famous Scotch vessels deservedly so much esteemed at home. The inns are usually bad, because the custom of boarding at hotels is not so general here as in the States, and the British officers, who form a large portion of the society of every town, live chiefly at the regimental messes, but in every other respect the traveller in Canada will find as good provision for his comfort as in any place I know.

There is one American boat—the vessel which carried us on Lake Champlain from St John's to Whitehall-which I praise very highly, but no more than it deserves, when I say that it is superior even to that in which we went from Queenston to Toronto, or to that in which we travelled from the latter place to Kingston, or I have no doubt I may add to any other in the world This steamboat, which is called the Burlington, is a perfectly exquisite achievement of neatness, elegance, and order The decks are drawing rooms, the cabins are boudoirs, choicely furnished and adorned with prints, pictures, and musical instruments, every nook and corner in the vessel is a perfect curiosity of graceful comfort and beautiful contrivance Captain Sherman, her com mander (to whose ingenuity and excellent taste these results are solely attributable), has bravely and worthily distinguished himself on more than one trying occasion-not least among them, in having the moral courage to carry British troops at a time (during the Canadian rebellion) when no other conveyance was open to them He and his vessel are held in universal respect, both by his own countrymen and ours, and no man ever enjoyed the popular esteem who, in his sphere of action, won and wore it better than this gentleman

By means of this floating palace we were soon in the United States again, and called that evening at Burlington—a pretty town, where we lay an hour or so We reached Whitehall, where we were to disembark, at six next morning, and might have done so earlier, but that these steamboats lie by for some hours in the night, in consequence of the lake becoming very narrow at that part of the journey, and difficult of navigation in the dark. Its width is so contracted at one point, indeed, that they are obliged to warp round by means of a rope

After breakfasting at Whitehall, we took the stage coach for Albany, a large and busy town, where we arrived between five and six o'clock that afternoon, after a very hot day's journey, for we were now in the height of summer again. At seven we started for New York on board a great North River steamboat, which was so crowded with passengers that the upper deck was like the box-lobby of a theatre between the pieces, and the lower one like Tottenham Court Road on a Saturday night. But we slept soundly notwithstanding, and soon after five o'clock next morning reached New York

Tarrying here only that day and night, to recruit after our late fatigues, we started off once more upon our last journey in America. We had yet five days to spare before embarking for England, and I had a great desire to see "the Shaker Village," which is peopled by a religious sect from whom it takes its name

To this end, we went up the North River again as far as the town of Hudson, and there hired an extra to carry us to Lebanon, thirty miles distant—and, of course, another and a different Lebanon from that village where I slept on the night of the Praine trip of the Prairie trip

The country through which the road meandered was rich and beautiful, the weather very fine, and for many miles the Kaatskill Mountains, where Rip Van Winkle and the ghastly Dutchmen played at ninepins one memorable gusty afternoon, towered in the blue distance, like stately clouds. At one point, as we ascended a steep hill, athwart whose base a railroad, yet constructing, took its course, we came upon an Irish colony. With means at hand of building decent cabins, it was wonderful to see how clumsy, rough, and wretched its hovels were. The best were poor protection from the weather, the worst let in the wind and rain through wide breaches in the roofs of sodden grass and in the walls of mud, some had neither door nor window, some had nearly fallen down, and were imperfectly propped up by stakes and poles, all were runous and filthy Hideously ugly old women and very buxom young ones, pigs, dogs, men, children, babies, pots, kettles, dunghills, vile refuse, rank straw, and standing water, all wallowing together in an inseparable heap, composed the furniture of every dark and dirty hut

Between nine and ten o'clock at night we arrived at Lebanon, which is renowned for its warm baths, and for a great hotel-well adapted, I have no doubt, to the gregarious taste of those seekers after health or pleasure who repair here, but inexpressibly comfortless to me We were shown into an immense apartment, lighted by two dim candles, called the drawing room, from which there was a descent by a flight of steps to another vast desert called the dining room Our bedchambers were among certain long rows of little white-washed cells, which opened from either side of a dreary passage, and were so like rooms in a prison that I half expected to be locked up when I went to bed, and listened involuntarily for the turning of the key on the outside There need be baths somewhere in the neighbourhood, for the other washing arrangements were on as limited a scale as I ever saw, even in America, indeed, these bedrooms were so very bare of even such common luxuries as chairs, that I should say they were not provided with enough of anything, but that I bethink myself of our having been most bountifully bitten all night

The house is very pleasantly situated, however, and we had a good breakfast. That done, we went to visit our place of destination, which was some two miles off, and the way to which was soon indicated by a finger-post, whereon was

As we rode along, we passed a party of Shakers, who were at work upon the road, who were the broadest of all broad-brimmed hats, and were, in all visible respects, such very wooden men, that I felt about as much sympathy for them, and as much interest in them, as if they had been so many figureheads of ships. Presently we came to the beginning of the village, and alighting at the door of a house where the Shaker manufactures are sold, and which is the headquarters of the elders, requested permission to see the Shaker worship

Pending the conveyance of this request to some person in authority, we walked into a grim room, where several grim hats were hanging on grim pegs, and the time was grimly told by a grim clock, which uttered every tick with a kind of struggle, as if it broke the grim silence reluctantly and under protest Ranged against the wall were six or eight stiff high-backed chairs, and they partook so strongly of the general grimness, that one would much rather have sat on the floor than incurred the smallest obligation to any of them

Presently there stalked into this apartment a grim old Shaker, with eyes as hard, and dull, and cold as the great round metal buttons on his coat and waistcoat—a sort of calm goblin. Being informed of our desire, he produced a newspaper wherein the body of elders, whereof he was a member, had advertised but a few days before, that in consequence of certain unseemly interruptions which their worship had received from strangers, their chapel was closed to the public for the space of one year

As nothing was to be urged in opposition to this reasonable arrangement, we requested leave to make some trifling purchases of Shaker goods, which was grimly conceded. We accordingly repaired to a store on the same house, and on the opposite side of the passage, where the stock was presided over by something alive in a russet case, which the elder said was a woman, and which I suppose was a woman, though I should not have suspected it

On the opposite side of the road was their place of worship—a cool, clean edifice of wood, with large windows and green blinds, like a spacious summer house. As there was no getting into this place, and nothing was to be done but walk up and down and look at it and the other buildings in the village (which were chiefly of wood, painted a dark red like English barns, and composed of many stories like English factories), I have nothing to communicate to the reader, beyond the scanty results I gleaned the while our purchases were making

These people are called Shakers from their peculiar form of adoration, which consists of a dance performed by the men and women of all ages, who arrange themselves for that purpose in opposite parties, the men first divesting themselves of their hats and coats (which they gravely hang against the wall before they begin), and tying a ribbon round their shirt-sleeves as though they were going to be bled. They accompany themselves with a droning, humming noise, and dance until they are quite exhausted, alternately advancing and retiring in a preposterous sort of trot. The effect is said to be unspeakably absurd, and if I may judge from a print of this ceremony which I have in my possession, and which I am informed by those who have visited the chapel is perfectly accurate, it must be infinitely grotesque

They are governed by a woman, and her rule is understood to be absolute, though she has the assistance of a council of elders. She lives, it is said, in strict seclusion, in certain rooms above the chapel, and is never shown to profane eyes. If she at all resemble the lady who presided over the store, it is a great charity to keep her as close as possible, and I cannot too strongly express my perfect concurrence in this benevolent proceeding.

All the possessions and revenues of the settlement are thrown into a common stock, which is managed by the elders. As they have made converts among people who were well to do in the world, and are frugal and thrifty, it is understood that this fund prospers, the more especially as they have made large purchases of land. Nor is this at Lebanon the only Shaker settlement—there are, I think, at least, three others

They are good farmers, and all their produce is eagerly purchased and highly esteemed "Shaker seeds," "Shaker herbs," and "Shaker distilled waters" are commonly announced for sale in the shops of towns and cities. They are good breeders of cattle, and are kind and merciful to the brute creation. Consequently, Shaker beasts seldom fail to find a ready market

They eat and drink together, after the Spartan model, at a great public table. There is no union of the sexes, and every Shaker, male and female, is devoted to a life of celibacy Rumour has been busy upon this theme, but here again I must refer to the lady of the store, and say, that if many of the sister Shakers resemble her, I treat all such slander as bearing on its face the strongest marks of wild improbability

But that they take as proselytes persons so young that they cannot know their own minds, and cannot possess much strength of resolution in this or any other respect, I can assert from my own observation of the extreme juvenility of certain youthful Shakers whom I saw at work among the party on the road.

They are said to be good drivers of bargains, but to be honest and just in their transactions, and even in horse-dealing to resist those thievish tendencies which would seem, for some undiscovered reason, to be almost inseparable from that branch of traffic In all matters they hold their own course quietly, live in their gloomy silent commonwealth, and show little desire to interfere with other people

This is well enough, but nevertheless I cannot, I confess, incline towards the Shakers, view them with much favour, or extend towards them any very lement construction abhor, and from my soul detest, that bad spirit, no matter by what class or sect it may be entertained, which would strip life of its healthful graces, rob youth of its innocent pleasures, pluck from maturity and age their pleasant ornaments, and make existence but a narrow path towards the grave odious spirit which, if it could have had full scope and sway upon the earth, must have blasted and made barren the imaginations of the greatest men, and left them, in their power of raising up enduring images before their fellowcreatures yet unborn, no better than the beasts that, in these very broad-brimmed hats and very sombre coats-in stiff-necked, solemn-visaged piety, in short, no matter what its garb, whether it have cropped hair as in a Shaker village, or long nails as in a Hindu temple-I recognize the worst among the enemies of heaven and earth, who turn the water at the marriage feasts of this poor world, not into wine, but gall And if there must be people vowed to crush the harmless fancies and the love of innocent delights and gaieties which are a part of human nature—as much a part of it as any other love or hope that is our common portion-let them, for me, stand openly revealed among the ribald and licentious, the very idiots know that they are not on the immortal road, and will despise them, and avoid them readily

Shakers, and a hearty pity for the young ones—tempered by the strong probability of their running away as they grow older and wiser, which they not uncommonly do—we returned to Lebanon, and so to Hudson, by the way we had come upon the previous day There we took the steamboat down the North River towards New York, but stopped, some four hours' journey short of it, at West Point, where we remained that night, and all next day, and next night too

In this beautiful place—the fairest among the fair and lovely Highlands of the North River—shut in by deep green heights and ruined forts, and looking down upon the distant town of Newburgh, along a glittering path of sunlit water, with here and there a skiff, whose white sail often bends on some new tack as sudden flaws of wind come down upon her from the gullies in the hills—hemmed in, besides, all round with memories of Washington, and events of the revolutionary war—is the Military School of America.

It could not stand on more appropriate ground, and any ground more beautiful can hardly be The course of education is severe, but well devised and manly Through June, July, and August, the young men encamp upon the spacious plain whereon the college stands, and all the year their military exercises are performed there daily. The term of study at this institution which the State requires from all cadets is four years, but whether it be from the rigid nature of the discipline, or the national impatience of restraint, or both causes combined, not more than half the number who begin their studies here ever remain to finish them.

The number of cadets being about equal to that of the members of Congress, one is sent here from every Congressional district, its member influencing the selection. Commissions in the service are distributed on the same principle. The dwellings of the various professors are beautifully situated, and there is a most excellent hotel for strangers, though it has the two drawbacks of being a total abstinence house (wines and spirits being forbidden to the students), and of serving the public meals at rather uncomfortable hours—to wit, breakfast at seven, dinner at one, and supper at sunset.

The beauty and freshness of this calm retreat, in the very dawn and greenness of summer—it was then the beginning of June—were exquisite indeed Leaving it upon the sixth, and returning to New York to embark for England on the succeeding day, I was glad to think that among the last memorable beauties which had glided past us, and softened in the bright perspective, were those whose pictures, traced by no common hand, are fresh in most men's minds, not easily to grow old or fade beneath the dust of Time—the Kaatskill Mountains, Sleepy Hollow, and the Tappaan Zee

THE PASSAGE HOME

I NEVER had so much interest before, and very likely I shall never have so much interest again, in the state of the wind, as on the long looked-for morning of Tuesday, the seventh of June. Some nautical authority had told me a day or two previous, "anything with west in it will do," so when I darted out of bed at daylight, and throwing up the window, was saluted by a lively breeze from the north-west which had sprung up in the night, it came upon me so freshly, rustling with so many happy associations, that I conceived upon the spot a special regard for all airs blowing from that quarter of the compass, which I shall cherish, I dare say, until my own wind has breathed its last frail puff, and withdrawn itself for ever from the mortal calefidar

The pilot had not been slow to take advantage of this favourable weather, and the ship which yesterday had been in such a crowded dock that she might have retired from trade for good and all, for any chance she seemed to have of going to sea, was now full sixteen miles away. A gallant sight she was when we, fast gaining on her in a steamboat, saw her in the distance riding at anchor, her tall masts pointing up in graceful lines against the sky, and every rope and spar expressed in delicate and threadlike outline, gallant, too, when, we being all aboard, the anchor came up to the sturdy chorus, "Cheerily, men, oh, cheerily!" and she followed proudly in the towing steamboat's wake, but bravest and most gallant of all when, the tow-rope being cast

In the after-cabin we were only fifteen passengers in all, and the greater part were from Canada, where some of us had known each other. The night was rough and squally, so were the next two days, but they flew by quickly, and we were soon as cheerful and as snug a party, with an honest, manly-hearted captain at our head, as ever came to the resolution of being mutually agreeable, on land or water

We breakfasted at eight, lunched at twelve, dined at three, and took our tea at half past seven We had abundance of amusements, and dinner was not the least among them firstly, for its own sake, secondly, because of its extraordinary length—its duration, inclusive of all the long pauses between the courses, being seldom less than two hours and a half, which was a subject of never-failing entertainment By way of beguiling the tediousness of these banquets, a select association was formed at the lower end of the table. below the mast, to whose distinguished president modesty forbids me to make any further allusion, which, being a very hilarious and jovial institution, was (prejudice apart) in high favour with the rest of the community, and particularly with a black steward, who lived for three weeks in a broad grin at the marvellous humour of these incorporated worthies

Then we had chess for those who played it, whist, cribbage, books, backgammon, and shovelboard. In all weathers, fair or foul, calm or windy, we were every one on deck, walking up and down in pairs, lying in the boats, leaning over the side, or chatting in a lazy group together. We had no lack of music, for one played the accordion, another the violin, and another (who usually began at six o'clock a.m.) the keybugle, the combined effect of which instruments, when they all played different tunes in different parts of the ship, at the same time, and within hearing of each other, as they sometimes did (everybody being intensely satisfied with his own performance), was sublimely hideous

When all these means of entertainment failed, a sail would heave in sight—looming, perhaps, the very spirit of a ship, in the misty distance, or passing us so close that through our glasses we could see the people on her decks, and easily make out her name, and whither she was bound. For hours together we could watch the dolphins and porpoises as they rolled and leaped and dived around the vessel, or those small creatures, ever on the wing, the Mother Carey's chickens, which had borne us company from New York bay, and for a whole fortnight fluttered about the vessel's stern For some days we had a dead calm, or very light winds, during which the crew amused themselves with fishing, and hooked an unlucky dolphin, who expired, in all his rainbow colours, on the deck—an event of such importance in our barren calendar, that afterwards we dated from the dolphin, and made the day on which he died an era

Besides all this, when we were five or six days out, there began to be much talk of icebergs, of which wandering islands an unusual number had been seen by the vessels that had come into New York a day or two before we left that port, and of whose dangerous neighbourhood we were warned by the sudden coldness of the weather, and the sinking of the mercury in the barometer. While these tokens lasted, a double look-out was kept, and many dismal tales were whispered after dark, of ships that had struck upon the ice and gone down in the night, but the wind obliging us to hold a southward course, we saw none of them, and the weather soon grew bright and warm again.

The observation every day at noon, and the subsequent working of the vessel's course, was, as may be supposed, a feature in our lives of paramount importance, nor were there wanting (as there never are) sagacious doubters of the captain's calculations, who, so soon as his back was turned, would, in the absence of compasses, measure the chart with bits of string, and ends of pocket-handkerchiefs, and points of snuffers, and clearly prove him to be wrong by an odd thousand miles or so. It was very edifying to see these unbelievers shake their heads and frown, and hear them hold forth strongly upon navigation not that they knew anything about it, but that they always mistrusted the captain in calm weather, or when the wind was adverse. Indeed, the mercury itself is not so variable as this class of passengers, whom you will see, when the ship is going nobly through the water, quite pale with admiration, swearing that the captain beats all captains ever known, and even hinting at subscriptions for a piece of plate, and who, next morning, when the breeze has lulled, and all the sails hang useless in the idle air, shake their despondent heads again, and say, with screwed-up lips, they hope that the captain is a sailor—but they shrewdly doubt him

It even became an occupation in the calm, to wonder when the wind would spring up in the favourable quarter, where, it was clearly shown by all the rules and precedents, it ought to have sprung up long ago. The first mate, who whistled for it zealously, was much respected for his perseverance, and was regarded even by the unbelievers as a first-rate sailor Many gloomy looks would be cast upward through the cabin sky-lights at the flapping sails while dinner was in progress, and some, growing bold in ruefulness, predicted that we should land about the middle of Tulv There are always on board ship a Sanguine One and a Despondent One The latter character carried it hollow at this period of the voyage, and triumphed over the Sanguine One at every meal, by inquiring where he supposed the Grea. Western (which left New York a week after us) was now, and where he supposed the "Cunard" steam-packet was now, and what he thought of sailing-vessels as compared with steamships now and so beset his life with pestilent attacks of that kind, that he, too, was obliged to affect despondency, for very seace and quietude

These were additions to the list of entertaining incidents, but there was still another source of interest. We carried in the steerage nearly a hundred passengers—a little world of poverty—and as we came to know individuals among them by sight, from looking down upon the deck where they took the air in the daytime, and cooked their food, and very often ate it too, we became curious to know their histories, and with what expectations they had gone out to America, and on what errands they were going home, and what their circumstances were. The information we got on these heads from the carpenter, who had charge of these people, was often of the strangest kind. Some of them had been in America but three days, some but three months, and some had gone out in the last voyage of that very ship in which they were now returning home. Others had sold their clothes to raise the passage money, and had hardly rags to cover them, others had no food, and lived upon the charity of the rest, and one man, it was discovered nearly at the end of the voyage, not before—for he kept his secret close, and did not court compassion—had had no sustenance whatever but the bones and scraps of fat he took from the plates used in the after-cabin dinner, when they were put out to be washed

The whole system of shipping and conveying these unfortunate persons is one that stands in need of thorough revision If any class deserve to be protected and assisted by the Government, it is that class who are banished from their native land in search of the bare means of subsistence All that could be done for these poor people by the great compassion and humanity of the captain and officers was done, but they require much more The law is bound, at least upon the English side, to see that too many of them are not put on board one ship, and that their accommodations are decent, not demoralizing and profligate. It is bound, too, in common humanity, to declare that no man shall be taken on board without his stock of provisions being previously inspected by some proper officer, and pronounced moderately sufficient for his support upon the voyage It is bound to provide, or to require that there be provided, a medical attendant, whereas in these ships there are none, though sickness of adults and deaths of children on the passage are matters of the very commonest occurrence Above all, it is the duty of any Government, be it monarchy or republic, to interpose and put an end to that system by which a firm of traders in emigrants purchase of the owners the whole 'tween decks of a ship, and send on board as many wretched people as they can lay hold of, on any terms they can get, without the smallest reference to the conveniences of the steerage, the number of berths, the slightest separation of the sexes, or anything but their own immediate profit Nor is even this the worst of the vicious system, for certain crimping agents of these houses, who have a percentage on all the passengers they inveigle, are constantly travelling about those districts where poverty and discontent are rife, and tempting the credulous into more misery by holding out monstrous inducements to emigration which can never be realized

The history of every family we had on board was pretty much the same After hoarding up, and borrowing, and begging, and selling everything to pay the passage, they had gone out to New York expecting to find its streets paved with gold, and had found them paved with very hard and very real stones Enterprise was dull, labourers were not wanted, jobs of work were to be got, but the payment was not They were coming back even poorer than they went One of them was carrying an open letter from a young English artisan, who had been in New York a fortnight, to a friend near Manchester, whom he strongly urged to follow him One of the officers brought it to me as a curiosity "This is the country, Jem," said the writer "I like America. There is no despotism here, that's the great thing Employment of all sorts is going a-begging, and wages are capital You have only to choose a trade, Jem, and be it I haven't made choice of one yet, but I shall soon At present I haven't quite made up my mind whether to be a carpenter—or a tailor"

There was yet another kind of passenger, and but one more, who, in the calm and the light winds, was a constant theme of conversation and observation among us. This was an English sailor, a smart, thorough-built English man of-war's man from his hat to his shoes, who was serving in the American Navy, and having got leave of absence, was on his way home to see his friends. When he presented himself to take and pay for his passage, it had been suggested to him that being an able seaman he might as well work it and save the money, but this piece of advice he very indignantly rejected, saying, "He'd be damned, but for once he'd go aboard ship as a gentleman." Accordingly, they took his money, but the no sooner came aboard than he stowed his kit in the forecastle, arranged to mess with the crew, and the very first time the hands were turned up, went aloft like a cat, before anybody. And all through the passage there he was, first at the braces, outermost on the yards, perpetually lending a hand everywhere, but always with a sober dignity in his manner, and a sober grin on his face, which plainly said, "I do it as a gentleman, for my own pleasure, mind you!"

At length and at last the promised wind came up in right good earnest, and away we went before it, with every stitch of canvas set, slashing through the water nobly There was a grandeur in the motion of the splendid ship as, overshadowed by her mass of sails, she rode at a furious pace upon the waves, which filled one with an indescribable sense of pride and exultation As she plunged into a foaming valley, how I loved to see the green waves, bordered deep with white, come rushing on astern, to buoy her upward at their pleasure, and curl about her as she stooped again, but always own her for their haughty mistress still! On, on we flew, with changing lights upon the water, being now in the blessed region of fleecy skies, a bright sun lighting us by day, and a bright moon by night, the vane pointing directly homeward, alike the truthful index to the favouring wind and to our cheerful hearts, until at sunrise, one fair Monday morning—the twenty-seventh of June I shall not easily forget the daythere lay before us old Cape Clear, God bless it ! showing, in the mist of early morning, like a cloud—the brightest and most welcome cloud to us that ever hid the face of Heaven's fallen sister-Home

Dim speck as it was in the wide prospect, it made the sunrise a more cheerful sight, and gave to it that sort of human interest which it seems to want at sea. There, as elsewhere, the return of day is inseparable from some sense of renewed hope and gladness, but the light shining on the dreary waste of water, and showing it in all its vast extent of loneliness, presents a solemn spectacle, which even night, veiling it in darkness and uncertainty, does not surpass The rising of the moon is more in keeping with the solitary ocean, and has an air of melancholy grandeur which, in its soft and gentle influence, seems to comfort while it saddens I recollect when I was a very young child having a fancy that the reflection of the moon in water was a path to heaven, trodden by the spirits of good people on their way to God, and this old feeling often came over me again when I watched it on a tranquil night at sea

The wind was very light on this same Monday morning, but it was still in the right quarter, and so, by slow degrees, we left Cape Clear behind, and sailed along within sight of the coast of Ireland And how merry we all were, and how loyal to the George Washington, and how full of mutual congratulations, and how venturesome in predicting the exact hour at which we should arrive at Liverpool, may be easily imagined and readily understood. Also, how heartily we drank the captain's health that day at dinner, and how restless we became about packing up, and how two or three of the most sanguine spirits rejected the idea of going to bed at all that night as something it was not worth while to do, so near the shore, but went nevertheless, and slept soundly, and how to be so near our journey's end, was like a pleasant dream, from which one feared to wake

The friendly breeze freshened again next day, and on we went once more before it gallantly, descrying now and then an English ship going homeward under shortened sail, while we, with every inch of canvas crowded on, dashed gaily past and left her far behind. Towards evening the weather turned hazy, with a drizzling rain, and soon became so thick that we sailed, as it were, in a cloud. Still we swept onward like a phantom ship, and many an eager eye glanced up to where the look-out on the mast kept watch for Holyhead.

At length his long-expected cry was heard, and at the same moment there shone out from the haze and mist ahead a gleaming light, which presently was gone, and soon returned, and soon was gone again. Whenever it came back, the eyes of all on board brightened and sparkled like itself, and there we all stood, watching this revolving light upon the rock at Holyhead, and praising it for its brightness and its friendly warning, and lauding it, in short, above all other signal lights that ever were displayed, until it once more glimmered faintly in the distance, far behind us

Then it was time to fire a gun for a pilot, and almost before its smoke had cleared away, a little boat with a light at her mast-head came bearing down upon us, through the darkness, swiftly And presently, our sails being backed, she ran alongside, and the hoarse pilot, wrapped and muffled in pea-coats and shawls to the very bridge of his weather-ploughed-up nose, stood bodily among us on the deck And I think if that pilot had wanted to borrow fifty pounds for an indefinite period on no security, we should have engaged to lend it to him, among us, before his boat had dropped astern, or (which is the same thing) before every scrap of news in the paper he brought with him had become the common

property of all on board

We turned in pretty late that night, and turned out pretty early next morning By six o'clock we clustered on the deck, prepared to go ashore, and looked upon the spires, and roofs, and smoke of Liverpool By eight we all sat down in one of its hotels, to eat and drink together for the last time And by nine we had shaken hands all round, and broken up our social company for ever

The country, by the railroad, seemed, as we rattled through it, like a luxuriant garden. The beauty of the fields (so small they looked!), the hedgerows, and the trees, the pretty cottages, the beds of flowers, the old churchyards, the antique houses, and every well-known object, the exquisite delights of that one journey, crowding in the short compass of a caminer's day the joy of many years, and winding up with Home and all that makes it dear, no tongue can tell, or pen of mane describe

THE upholders of slavery in America—of the atrocities of which system I shall not write one word for which I have not ample proof and warrant—may be divided into three great classes

The first are those more moderate and rational owners of human cattle, who have \come into the possession of them as so many coins in their trading capital, but who admit the frightful nature of the institution in the abstract, and perceive the dangers to society with which it is fraught—dangers which, however distant they may be, or howsoever tardy in their coming on, are as certa'in to fall upon its guilty head, as is the Day of Tudgment

The second consists of all those owners, breeders, users, buyers and sellers of slaves, who will, until the bloody chapter has a bloody end, own, breed, use, buy, and sell them at all hazards, who doggedly deny the horrors of the system in the teeth of such a mass of evidence as never was brought to bear on any other subject, and to which the experience of every day contributes its immense amount, who would at this or any other moment gladly involve America in a war, civil or foreign, provided that it had for its sole end and object the assertion of their right to perpetuate slavery, and to whip and work and torture slaves, unquestioned by any human authority and unassailed by any human power, who, when they speak of Freedom, mean the freedom to oppress their kind, and to be savage, merciless, and cruel, and of whom every man on his own ground, in republican America. is a more exacting, and a sterner, and a less responsible despot than the Caliph Haroun Alraschid in his angry robe of scarlet

The third, and not the least numerous or influential, is composed of all that delicate gentility which cannot bear a superior, and cannot brook an equal, of that class whose Republicanism means, "I will not tolerate a man aboume, and of those below, none must approach too near," whose pride, in a land where voluntary servitude is shunned as a disgrace, must be ministered to by slaves, and whose inalienable rights can only have their growth in negro wrongs.

It has been sometimes urged that, in the unavailing efforts which have been made to advance the cause of human freedom in the republic of America (etrange cause for history to treat of 1), sufficient regard has not been had to the existence of the first class of persons, and it has been contended that they are hardly used in being confounded with the second. This is, no doubt, the case Noble instances of pecuniary and personal sacrifice have already had their growth among them, and it is much to be regretted that the gulf between them and the advocates of emancipation should have been widened and deepened by any means, the rather, as there are beyond dispute, among these slave-owners, many kind masters who are tender in the exercise of their unnatural power Still it is to be feared that this injustice is inseparable from the state of things with which humanity and truth are called upon to deal. Slavery is not a whit the more endurable because some hearts are to be found which can partially resist its hardening influences, nor can the indignant tide of honest wrath stand still, because in its onward course it overwhelms a few who are comparatively innocent among a host

The ground most commonly taken by these better men among the advocates of slavery is this "It is a bad system, and for myself, I would willingly get rid of it if I could—most willingly But it is not so bad as you in England take it to be You are deceived by the representations of the emancipationists. The greater part of my slaves are much attached to me. You will say that I do not allow them to be severely treated, but I will put it to you whether you believe that it can be a general practice to treat them inhumanly, when it would impair their value, and would be obviously against the interests of their masters."

Is it the interest of any man to steal, to game, to waste his health and mental faculties by drunkenness, to he, forswear himself, indulge hatred, seek desperate revenge, or do murder? No All these are roads to ruin And why then do men tread them? Because such inclinations are among the vicious qualities of mankind Blot out, ye friends of slavery, from the catalogue of human passions, brutal lust, cruelty, and the abuse of irresponsible power (of all earthly temptations the most difficult to be resisted), and when ye have done so, and not before, we will inquire whether it be the interest of a master to lash and maim the slaves over whose lives and limbs he has an absolute control!

But again this class, together with that last one I have named—the miserable aristocracy spawned of a false republic—lift up their voices and exclaim, "Public opinion is all-sufficient to prevent such cruelty as you denounce" Public opinion! Why, public opinion in the slave States as slavery, is it not? Public opinion in the slave States has delivered the slaves over to the gentle mercies of their masters. Public opinion has made the laws, and denied the slaves legislative protection. Public opinion has knotted the lash, heated the branding-iron, loaded the rifle, and shielded the murderer. Public opinion threatens the abolitionist with death if he venture to the South, and drags him.

with a rope about his middle, in broad, unblushing noon, through the first city in the East Public opinion has, within a few years, burned a slave alive at a slow fire in the city of St. Louis, and public opinion has to this day main tained upon the bench that estimable judge who charged the jury, impanelled there to try his murderers, that their most horrid deed was an act of public opinion, and being so, must not be punished by the laws the public sentiment had made Public opinion hailed this doctrine with a howl of wild applause, and set the prisoners free, to walk the city, men of mark, and influence, and station, as they had been before.

Public opinion! what class of men have an immense preponderance over the rest of the community in their power of representing public opinion in the legislature?—the slave-owners. They send from their twelve States one hundred members, while the fourteen free States, with a free population nearly double, return but a hundred and forty-two Before whom do the presidential candidates bow down the most humbly, on whom do they fawn the most fondly, and for whose tastes do they cater the most assiduously in their servile protestations?—the slave-owners always

Public opinion! hear the public opinion of the free South, as expressed by its own members in the House of Representatives at Washington "I have a great respect for the chair," quoth North Carolina, "I have a great respect for the chair as an officer of the house, and a great respect for him personally, nothing but that respect prevents me from rushing to the table and tearing that petition which has just been presented for the abolition of slavery in the district of Columbia to pieces "-" I warn the abolitionists," says South Carolina, "ignorant, infuriated barbarians as they are, that if chance shall throw any of them into our hands, he may expect a felon's death '-" Let an abolitionist come within the borders of South Carolina," cries a third, mild Carolina's colleague, "and if we can catch him we will try him, and notwithstanding the interference of all the governments on earth, including the Federal government, we will HANG him"

Public opinion has made this law —It has declared that in Washington, in that city which takes its name from the father of American liberty, any justice of the peace may bind with fetters any negro passing down the street, and thrust him with fetters any negro passing down the street, and thrust him into jail—no offence on the black man's part is necessary. The justice says, "I choose to think this man a runaway," and locks him up Public opinion empowers the man of law when this is done to advertise the negro in the newspapers, warning his owner to come and claim him, or he will be sold to pay the jail fees But supposing he is a free black and has no owner, it may naturally be presumed that he is set at liberty No, HE IS SOLD TO RECOMPENSE HIS JAILER This has been done again, and again, and again. He has no means of proving his freedom, has no adviser, messenger or assistance of any sort or kind. senger, or assistance of any sort or kind, no investigation into his case is made, or inquiry instituted. He, a free man, who may have served for years and bought his liberty, is thrown into jail on no process, for no crime, and on no pre-tence of crime, and is sold to pay the jail fees This seems incredible even of America, but it is the law

Public opinion is deferred to in such cases as the following, which is headed in the newspapers -

"Interesting Law Case

"An interesting case is now on trial in the Supreme Court, arising out of the following facts: A gentleman residing in Maryland had allowed an aged pair of his slaves substantial, though not legal, freedom for several years. While thus living, a daughter was born to them, who grew up in the same liberty, until she married a free negro, and went with him to reside in Pennsylvania. They had several children, and lived unmolested until the original owner died, when his heir attempted to regain them, but the magistrate before whom they were brought decided that he had no jurisdiction in the case. The owner coved the moment and her children in in the case The owner seized the woman and her children in the night, and carried them to Maryland"

"Cash for negroes," "cash for negroes," "cash for negroes," is the heading of advertisements in great capitals down the long columns of the crowded journals Woodcuts of a runaway negro with manacled hands, crouching beneath a bluff pursuer in top-boots, who, having caught him, grasps him by the throat, agreeably diversify the pleasant text. The leading article protests against "that abominable and hellish doctrine of abolition, which is repugnant alike to every law of God and nature". The delicate mamma, who smiles her acquiescence in this sprightly writing as she reads the paper in her cool piazza, quiets her youngest child, who clings about her skirts, by promising the boy "a whip to beat the little niggers with". But the negroes, little and

Let us try this public opinion by another test, which is important in three points of view first, as showing how desperately timid of the public opinion slave owners are in their delicate descriptions of fugitive slaves in widely-circulated newspapers, secondly, as showing how perfectly contented the slaves are, and how very seldom they run away, thirdly, as exhibiting their entire freedom from scar, or blemish, or any mark of cruel infliction, as their pictures are drawn, not by lying abolitionists, but by their own truthful masters

The following are a few specimens of the advertisements in the public papers It is only four years since the oldest among them appeared, and others of the same nature continue to be published every day in shoals

"Ran away, Negress Caroline Had on a collar with one prong turned down "

"Ran away, a black woman, Betsy Had an iron bar on her right leg"

"Ran away, the negro Manuel Much marked with irons"

"Ran away, the negress Fanny Had on an Iron band about her neck"

"Ran away, a negro boy about twelve years old Had round his neck a charn dog-collar with 'De Lampert' engraved on it"

"Ran away, negro Ben Has a scar on his right hand; his thumb and forefinger being injured by being shot last fall A part of the bone came out He has also one or two large scars on his back and hips"

"Detained at the jail, a mulatto named Tom Has a scar on the right cheek, and appears to have been burned with powder on the face."

"Ran away, a negro man named Ned Three of his fingers are drawn into the palm of his hand by a cut. Has a scar on the back of his neck, nearly half round, done by a knife."

"Was committed to jail, a negro man Says his name is Josiah His back very much scarred by the whip, and branded on the thigh and hips in three or four places, thus (J M) The rim of his right ear has been bit or cut off"

"Fifty dollars reward for my fellow Edward He has a scar on the corner of his mouth, two cuts on and under his arm, and the letter E on his arm"

"Ran away, negro boy Ellie Has a scar on one of his arms from the bite of a dog"

"Ran away, a negro woman named Maria. Has a scar on one side of her cheek, by a cut Some scars on her back"

"Ran away, the mulatto wench Mary Has a cut on the left arm, a scar on the left shoulder, and two upper teeth

I should say, perhaps, in explanation of this latter piece of description, that among the other blessings which public opinion secures to the negroes, is the common practice of violently punching out their teeth. To make them wear iron collars by day and by night, and to worry them with dogs, are practices almost too ordinary to deserve mention.

"Ran away, my man, Fountain Has holes in his ears, a scar on the right side of his forehead, has been shot in the hind parts of his legs, and is marked on the back with the

"Two hundred and fifty dollars reward for my negro man Jim. He is much marked with shot in his right thigh. The shot entered on the outside, half-way between the hip and knee-joints"

"Brought to jail, John Left ear cropt"

"Taken up, a negro man. Is very much scarred about the face and body, and has the left ear bit off"

"Ran away, a black girl named Mary Has a scar on her cheek, and the end of one of her toes cut off"

"Ran away, my mulatto woman, Judy She has had her right arm broke"

"Ran away, my negro man, Levi His left hand has been burnt, and I think the end of his forefinger is off"

"Ran away, a negro man, NAMED WASHINGTON Has lost a part of his middle finger, and the end of his little finger"

"Twenty-five dollars reward for my man John The tip of his nose is bit off"

"Twenty-five dollars reward for the negro slave Sally Walks as though crippled in the back"

"Ran away, Joe Dennis Has a small notch in one of

"Ran away, negro boy, Jack Has a small crop out of his left ear"

"Ran away, a negro man named Ivory Has a small piece cut out of the top of each ear"

While upon the subject of ears, I may observe that a distinguished abolitionist in New York once received a negro's ear, which had been cut off close to the head, in a general post letter. It was forwarded by the free and independent gentleman who had caused it to be amputated, with a polite request that he would place the specimen in his "collection"

I could enlarge this catalogue with broken arms, and broken legs, and gashed flesh, and missing teeth, and lacerated backs, and bites of dogs, and brands of red-hot irons innumerable, but as my readers will be sufficiently sickened and repelled already, I will turn to another branch of the subject

These advertisements—of which a similar collection might be made for every year, and month, and week, and day, and which are coolly read in families as things of course, and as a part of the current news and small talk—will serve to show how very much the slaves profit by public opinion, and how tender it is in their behalf. But it may be worth while to inquire how the slave-owners, and the class of society to which great numbers of them belong, defer to public opinion in their conduct, not to their slaves, but to each other, how they are accustomed to restrain their passions, what their bearing is among themselves, whether they are fierce or gentle, whether their social customs be brutal sanguinary. and violent, or bear the impress of civilization and refinement.

That we may have no partial evidence from abolitionists in this inquiry either, I will once more turn to their own newspapers, and I will confine myself this time to a selection from paragraphs which appeared from day to day during my visit to America, and which refer to occurrences happening while I was there The italics in these extracts, as in the

These cases did not ALL occur, it will be seen, in territory actually belonging to legalized Slave States, though most, and those the very worst among them, did, as their counterparts constantly do, but the position of the scenes of action in reference to places immediately at hand, where slavery is the law, and the strong resemblance between that class of outrages and the rest, lead to the just presumption that the character of the parties concerned was formed in slave districts, and brutalized by slave customs

" Horrible Tragedy-

"By a slip from The Southport Telegraph, Wisconsin, we learn that the Hon Charles C P Arndt, Member of the Council for Brown county, was shot dead on the floor of the Council chamber, by James R. Vinyard, Member from Grant county The affair grew out of a nomination for Sheriff of Grant county Mr E & Baker was nominated and supported by Mr Arndt This nomination was opposed by Vinyard, who wanted the appointment to vest in his own brother the course of debate, the deceased made some statements which Vinyard pronounced false, and made use of violent and insulting language, dealing largely in personalities, to which Mr A made no reply After the adjournment, Mr A. stepped up to Vinyard, and requested him to retract, which he refused to do, repeating the offensive words Mr Arndt then made a blow at Vinyard, who stepped back a pace, drew a pistol, and shot him dead.

"The issue appears to have been provoked on the part of Vinyard, who was determined at all hazards to defeat the appointment of Baker, and who, himself defeated, turned his re and revenge upon the unfortunate Arndt"

"The Wisconsin Tragedy

"Public indignation runs high in the territory of Wisconsin, in relation to the murder of C C P Arndt, in the Legislative Hall of the Terntory Meetings have been held in different counties of Wisconsin, denouncing the practice of secretly bearing arms in the legislative chambers of the country We have seen the account of the expulsion of James R Vinyard, the perpetrator of the bloody deed, and are amazed to hear that, after this expulsion by those who saw Vinyard kill Mr Arndt in the presence of his aged father, who was on a visit to see his son, little dreaming that he was to witness his murder, Judge Dunn has discharged Vinyard on bail The Miners' Free Press speaks in terms of merited rebuke at the outrage upon the feelings of the people of Wisconsin Vipara was within arm's length of Mr Arndt, when he took such deadly aim at him that he never spoke Vinyard might at pleasure, being so near, have only wounded him, but he chose to kill him".

"Murder

"By a letter in a St Louis paper of the 14th, we notice a terrible outrage at Burlington, Iowa A Mr Bridgman having had a difficulty with a citizen of the place, Mr Ross, a brother-in-law of the latter provided himself with one of Colt's revolving plistols, met Mr B. in the street, and discharged the contents of five of the barrels at him, each shot taking effect Mr B, though horribly wounded, and dying, returned the fire, and killed Ross on the spot."

"Texrible Death of Robert Potter

"From the Caddo Gazette, of the 12th 11st., we learn the frightful death of Colonel Robert Potter He was beset in his house by an enemy, named Rose He sprang from his couch, seized his gun, and, in his night-clothes, rushed from the house For about two hundred yards his speed seemed to defy his pursuers, but, getting entangled in a thicket, he was captured Rose told him that he intended to act a generous part, and give him a chance for his life. He then told Potter he might run, and he should not be interrupted till he reached a certain distance. Potter started at the word of command, and before a gun was fired he had reached the lake. His first impulse was to jump in the water and dive for it, which he did. Rose was close behind him, and formed his men on the bank ready to shoot him as he rose. In a few seconds he came up to breathe, and scarce had his head reached the surface of the water, when it was completely riddled with the shot of their guns, and he sank, to rise no more!"

" Murder in Arkansas

"We understand that a severe rencontre came off a few days since in the Seneca Nation, between Mr Loose, the sub-agent of the mixed band of the Senecas, Quapaw, and Shawnees, and Mr James Gillespie, of the mercantile firm of Thomas G Allison and Co, of Maysville, Benton, County Ark, in which the latter was slain with a bowie-knife Some difficulty had for some time existed between the parties. It is said that Major Gillespie brought on the attack with a cane. A severe conflict ensued, during which two pistols were fired by Gillespie and one by Loose Loose then stabbed Gillespie with one of those never-failing weapons, a bowie-knife. The death of Major G is much regretted, as he was a liberal-minded and energetic man. Since the above was in type, we have learned that Major Allison has stated to some of our citizens in town that Mr Loose gave the first blow. We for-bear to give any particulars, as the matter will be the subject of nudicial investigation."

" Foul Deed

"The steamer Thames, just from Missouri River, brought us a handbill, offering a reward of 500 dollars for the person who assassinated Lilburn W Baggs, late Governor of this

State, at Independence, on the night of the 6th inst Governor Baggs, it is stated in a written memorandum, was not dead, but mortally wounded

"Since the above was written, we received a note from the clerk of the Thames, giving the following particulars Gov Baggs was shot by some villain on Friday, 6th inst. in the evening, while sitting in a room in his own house in Independence His son, a boy, hearing a report, ran into the room, and found the Governor sitting in his chair, with his taw fallen down and his head leaning back On discovering the injury done to his father, he gave the alarm tracks were found in the garden below the window, and a pistol was picked up, supposed to have been overloaded, and thrown from the hand of the scoundrel who fired it buckshots of a heavy load took effect—one going through his mouth, one into the brain, and another probably in or near the brain, all going into the back part of the neck and head The Governor was still alive on the morning of the 7th, but no hopes of his recovery by his friends, and but slight hopes from his physicians

"A man was suspected, and the Sheriff most probably has possession of him by this time

"The pistol was one of a pair stolen some days previous from a baker in Independence, and the legal authorities have the description of the other"

"Rencontre

"An unfortunate affair took place on Friday evening in Chatres Street, in which one of our most respectable citizens received a dangerous wound, from a poignard, in the abdomen From the Bee (New Orleans) of yesterday, we learn the following particulars. It appears that an article was published in the French side of the paper on Monday last, containing some strictures on the Artillery Battalion for firing their guns on Sunday morning, in answer to those from the Ontario and Woodbury, and thereby much alarm was caused to the families of those persons who were out all night preserving the peace of the city. Major C Gally, Commander of the battalion, resenting this, called at the office and demanded the author's name, that of Mr P Arpin was given to him, who was absent at the time Some angry words then passed with one of the proprietors, and a challenge followed. The friends of both parties tried to arrange the affair, but failed to do so On Friday evening, about seven o'clock, Major Gally met Mr P Arpin in Chatres Street, and accosted him 'Are you Mr Arpin?'

"'Yes, sir'

"'Then I have to tell you that you are a---' (applying an appropriate epithet)

"I shall remind you of your words, sir'

"'But I have said I would break my cane on your shoulders'

"'I know it, but I have not yet received the blow'

"At these words, Major Gally, having a cane in his hands, struck Mr Arpin across the face, and the latter drew a poignard from his pocket and stabbed Major Gally in the abdomen

"Fears are entertained that the wound will be mortal We understand that Mr Arpin has given security for his appearance at the Criminal Court to answer the charge"

" Affray ın Mıssıssıppı

"On the 27th ult, in an affray near Carthage, Leake county, Mississippi. between James Cottingham and John Wilburn, the latter was shot by the former, and so hornbly wounded that there was no hope of his recovery. On the 2nd instant there was an affray at Carthage between A C Sharkey and George Goff, in which the latter was shot, and thought mortally wounded. Sharkey delivered himself up to the authorities, but changed his mind and escaped!"

" Personal Encounter

"An encounter took place in Sparta, a few days since, between the bar-keeper of an hotel, and a man named Bury It appears that Bury had become somewhat noisy, and that the bar-keeper, determined to preserve order, had threatened to shoot Bury, whereupon Bury drew a pistol and shot the bar-keeper down He was not dead at the last accounts, but slight hopes were entertained of his recovery"

"Duel

"The clerk of the steamboat Tribune informs us that another duel was fought on Tuesday last, by Mr Robbins, a bank officer in Vicksburg, and Mr Fall, the editor of the Vicksburg Sentine! According to the arrangement, the parties had six pistols each, which, after the word 'Fire!' they were to discharge as fast as they pleased Fall fired two pistols without effect Mr Robbins's first shot took effect in Fall's thigh, who fell, and was unable to continue the combat"

"Affray in Clarke County

"An unfortunate affray occurred in Clarke county (Mo), near Waterloo, on Tuesday, the 19th ult, which originated in settling the partnership concerns of Messrs M'Kane and M'Allister, who had been engaged in the business of distilling, and resulted in the death of the latter, who was shot down by Mr M'Kane because of his attempting to take possession of seven barrels of whisky, the property of M'Kane, which had been knocked off to M'Allister at a sheriff's sale at one dollar per barrel M'Kane immediately fled, and at the latest dates had not been taken

"This unfortunate affray caused considerable excitement in the neighbourhood, as both the parties were men with large families depending upon them, and stood well in the community"

I will quote but one more paragraph, which, by reason of its monstrous absurdity, may be a relief to these atrocious deeds

" Affair of Honour

"We have just heard the particulars of a meeting which took place on Six Mile Island on Tuesday, between two young bloods of our city, Samuel Thurston, aged fifteen, and William Hine, aged thirteen years They were attended by young gentlemen of the same age The weapons used on the occasion were a couple of Dickson's best rifles, the distance, thirty yards They took one fire, without any damage being sustained by either party, except the ball of Thurston's gun passing through the intercession of the Board of Honour, the challenge was withdrawn, and the difference amicably adjusted"

If the reader will picture to himself the kind of Board of Honour which amicably adjusted the difference between these two little boys, who in any other part of the world would have been amicably adjusted on two porters' backs, and soundly flogged with birchen rods, he will be possessed, no doubt, with as strong a sense of its ludicrous character, as that which sets me laughing whenever its image rises up before me

Now, I appeal to every human mind, imbued with the commonest of common sense, and the commonest of common humanity—to all dispassionate, reasoning creatures, of any shade of opinion—and ask, with these revolting evidences of the state of society which exists in and about the slave districts of America before them, can they have a doubt of the real condition of the slave, or can they for a moment make a compromise between the institution or any of its flagrant fearful features and their own just consciences? Will they say of any tale of cruelty and horror, however aggravated in degree, that it is improbable, when they can turn to the public prints, and, running, read such signs as these, laid before them by the men who rule the slaves—in their own acts, and under their own hands?

Do we not know that the worst deformity and ugliness of slavery are at once the cause and the effect of the reckless license taken by these freeborn outlaws? Do we not know that the man who has been born and bred among its wrongs, who has seen in his childhood husbands obliged at the word of command to flog their wives, women indecently compelled to hold up their own garments that men might lay the heavier stripes upon their legs, driven and harried by brutal overseers in their time of travail, and becoming mothers on the field of toil, under the very lash itself, who has read in youth, and seen his virgin sisters read, descriptions of runaway men and women, and their disfigured persons, which could not be published elsewhere, of so much stock upon a farm, or at a show of beasts,—do we not know that that man, whenever his wrath is kindled up, will be a brutal savage? Do we not know that as he is a coward in his domestic life, stalking among his shrinking men and women slaves armed with his heavy whip, so he will be a coward out of doors, and, carrying cowards' weapons hidden in his breast, will shoot men down and stablithem when he quarrels? And if our reason did not teach usithis and much beyond—if we were such idiots as to close ourreyes to that fine mode of training which rears up such men—should we not know that they who among their equals stab and pistol in the legislative halls, and in the counting-house, and on the market-place, and in all the else where peaceful pursuits of life, must be to their dependants, even though they were free servants, so many merciless and unrelenting tyrants

What! shall we declaim against the ignorant peasantry of Ireland, and mince the matter when these American taskmasters are in question? Shall we cry shame on the brutality of those who hamstring cattle, and spare the lights of Freedom upon earth who notch the ears of men and women, cut pleasant posies in the shrinking flesh, learn to write with pens of red-hot iron on the human face, rack their poetic fancies for liveries of mutilation which their slaves shall wear for life and carry to the grave, break living limbs as did the soldiery who mocked and slew the Saviour of the world, and set defenceless creatures up for targets? Shall we whimper over legends of the tortures practised on each other by the pagan Indians, and smile upon the cruelties of Christian men? Shall we, so long as these things last, exult above the scattered remnants of that stately race, and triumph in the white enjoyment of their broad possessions? Rather, for me, restore the forest and the Indian village, in lieu of Stars and Stripes, let some poor feather flutter in the breeze, replace the streets and squares by wigwams, and though the death-song of a hundred haughty warriors fill the air, it will be music to the shriek of one unhappy slave

On one theme, which is commonly before our eyes, and in respect of which our national character is changing fast, let the plain Truth be spoken, and let us not, like dastards, beat about the bush by hinting at the Spaniard and the fierce Italian When knives are drawn by Englishmen in conflict, let it be said and known "We owe this change to Republic can Slavery These are the weapons of Freedom With sharp points and edges such as these, Liberty in America hews and hacks her slaves, or, failing that pursuit, her sons devote them to a better use, and turn them on each other"

CONCLUDING REMARKS

There are many passages in this book where I have been at some pains to resist the temptation of troubling my readers with my own deductions and conclusions, preferring that they should judge for themselves, from such premises as I have laid before them My only object in the outset was to carry them with me faithfully wheresoever I went, and that task I have discharged

But I may be pardoned if, on such a theme as the general character of the American people, and the general character of their social system, as presented to a stranger's eyes, I desire to express my own opinions in a few words, before I

They are, by nature, frank, brave, cordial, hospitable, and affectionate Cultivation and refinement seem but to en hance their warmth of heart and ardent enthusiasm, and it is the possession of these latter qualities in a most remark able degree which renders an educated American one of the most endearing and most generous of friends. I never was so won upon as by this class, never yielded up my full confidence and esteem so readily and pleasurably as to them, never can make again, in half a year, so many friends for whom I seem to entertain the regard of half a life

These qualities are natural, I implicitly believe, to the whole people That they are, however, sadly sapped and blighted in their growth among the mass, and that there are influences at work which endanger them still more, and give but little present promise of their healthy restoration, is a truth that ought to be told

It is an essential part of every national character to pique esself mightily upon its faults, and to deduce tokens of its virtue or its wisdom from their very exaggeration. One great blemish in the popular mind of America, and the prolific parent of an innumerable brood of evils, is Universal Distrust. Yet the American citizen plumes himself upon this spirit, even when he is sufficiently dispassionate to perceive the ruin it works, and will often adduce it, in spite of his own reason, as an instance of the great sagacity and acuteness of the people, and their superior shrewdness and ındependence "You carry," says the stranger, "this jealousy and distrust into every transaction of public life By repelling worthy men from your legislative assemblies, it has bred up a class of candidates for the suffrage, who, in their every act, disgrace your institutions and your people's choice has rendered you so fickle, and so given to change, that your inconstancy has passed into a proverb, for you no sooner set up an idol firmly, than you are sure to pull it down and dash it into fragments and this, because directly you reward a benefactor, or a public servant, you distrust him, merely because he is rewarded, and immediately apply yourselves to find out, either that you have been too bountiful in your acknowledgments, or he remiss in his deserts man who attains a high place among you, from the President downwards, may date his downfall from that moment, for any printed lie that any notorious villain pens, although it militate directly against the character and conduct of a life, appeals at once to your distrust, and is believed You will strain at a gnat in the way of trustfulness and confidence. however fairly won and well deserved, but you will swallow a whole caravan of camels, if they be laden with unworthy doubts and mean suspicions Is this well, think you, or likely to elevate the character of the governors or the governed among you?"

The answer is invariably the same "There's freedom of opinion here, you know Every man thinks for himself, and we are not to be easily overreached That's how our people come to be suspicious"

Another prominent feature is the love of "smart" dealing, which gilds over many a swindle and gross breach of trust, many a defalcation, public and private, and enables many a knave to hold his head up with the best, who well deserves a halter, though it has not been without its retributive operation, for this smartness has done more in a few years to impair the public credit, and to cripple the public resources, than dull honesty, however rash, could have effected in a century The ments of a broken speculation, or a bankruptcy, or of a successful scoundrel, are not gauged by its or his observance of the golden rule, "Do as you would be done by," but are considered with reference to their smartness I recollect, on both occasions of our passing that illfated Cairo on the Mississippi, remarking on the bad effects such gross deceits must have when they exploded, in gener ating a want of confidence abroad, and discouraging foreign investment, but I was given to understand that this was a very smart scheme, by which a deal of money had been made, and that its smartest feature was, that they forgot these things abroad in a very short time, and speculated again as freely as ever The following dialogue I have held a hundred times "Is it not a very disgraceful circumstance that such a man as So-and so should be acquiring a large property by the most infamous and odious means, and notwithstanding all the crimes of which he has been guilty, should be tolerated and abetted by your citizens? He is a public nuisance, is he not?" "Yes, sir" "A convicted har?" "Yes, sir" "He has been kicked, and cuffed, and caned?" "Yes, sir" "And he is utterly dishonourable, debased, and profligate?" "Yes, sir" "In the name of wonder, then, what is his merit?" "Well, sir, he is a smart man "

In like manner, all kinds of deficient and impolitic usages are referred to the national love of trade, though, oddly enough, it would be a weighty charge against a foreigner that he regarded the Americans as a trading people. The love of trade is assigned as a reason for that comfortless custom, so very prevalent in country towns, of married persons living in hotels, having no fireside of their own, and seldom meeting, from early morning until late at night, but at the hasty public meals. The love of trade is a reason why the literature of America is to remain for ever unprotected "For we are a trading people, and don't care for poetry"—though we day by the way, profess to be very proud of our poets—while healthful amusements, cheerful means of recreation, and wholesome fancies, must fade before the stern utilitarian joys of trade

These three characteristics are strongly presented at every turn, full in the stranger's view. But the foul growth of America has a more tangled root than this, and it strikes its fibres deep in its licentious Press.

Schools may be erected, East, West, North, and South, pupils be taught, and masters reared, by scores upon scores of thousands, colleges may thrive, churches may be crammed, temperance may be diffused, and advancing knowledge in all other forms walk through the land with giant strides, but while the newspaper press of America is in, or near, its present abject state, high moral improvement in that country is hopeless. Year by year, it must and will go back, year by year, the tone of public feeling must sink lower down, year by year, the Congress and the Senate must become of less account before all decent men, and year by year, the memory of the Great Fathers of the Revolution must be outraged more and more, in the bad life of their degenerate child

Among the herd of journals which are published in the States, there are some, the reader scarcely need be told, of character and credit. From personal intercourse with ac complished gentlemen connected with publications of this class, I have derived both pleasure and profit. But the name of these is Few, and of the others Legion, and the influence of the good is powerless to counteract the moral poison of the bad

Among the gentry of America, among the well-informed and moderate—in the learned professions, at the bar and on the bench—there is, as there can be, but one opinion, in reference to the vicious character of these infamous journals. It is sometimes contended—I will not say strangely, for it is natural to seek excuses for such a disgrace—that their influence is not so great as a visitor would suppose. I must be pardoned for saying that there is no warrant for this plea, and that every fact and circumstance tends directly to the opposite conclusion.

When any man, of any grade of desert in intellect or character, can climb to any public distinction, no matter what, in America, without first grovelling down upon the earth and bending the knee before this monster of depravity, when any private excellence is safe from its attacks, when any social confidence is left unbroken by it, or any tie of social decency and honour is held in the least regard, when any man in that free country has freedom of opinion, and presumes to think for himself, and speak for himself, without humble reference to a censorship which, for its rampant gnorance and base dishonesty, he utterly loathes and despises in his heart, when those who most acutely feel its infamy and the reproach it casts upon the nation, and who most denounce it to each other, dare to set their heels upon and crush it openly in the sight of all men then I will believe that its influence is lessening, and men are returning to their manly senses while that Press has its evil eye in every house, and its black hand in every appointment in the state, from a president to a postman, while, with ribald slander for its only stock in trade, it is the standard literature of an enormous class, who must find their reading in a newspaper, or they will not read at all, so long must its odium be upon the country's head, and so long must the evil it works be plainly visible in the Republic

To those who are accustomed to the leading English journals, or to the respectable journals of the Continent of Europe—to those who are accustomed to anything else in print and paper—it would be impossible, without an amount of extract for which I have neither space nor inclination, to convey an adequate idea of this frightful engine in America. But if any man desire confirmation of my statement on this head, let him repair to any place in this city of London where scattered numbers of these publications are to be found, and there let him form his own opinion *

It would be well, there can be no doubt, for the American

^{*} NOTE TO THE ORIGINAL EDITION —Or let him refer to an able and perfectly truthful article in The Foreign Quarterly Review, published in the present month of October, to which my attention has been attracted, since these sheets have been passing through the press He will find some specimens there, by no means remarkable to any man who has been in America, but sufficiently striking to one who has not.

people as a whole, if they loved the Real less, and the Ideal somewhat more It would be well if there were greater encouragement to lightness of heart and gaiety, and a wider cultivation of what is beautiful, without being eminently and directly useful But here I think the general remonstrance, "We are a new country," which is so often advanced as an excuse for defects which are quite unjustifiable, as being, of right, only the slow growth of an old one, may be very reasonably urged, and I yet hope to hear of there being some other national amusement in the United States besides newspaper politics

They certainly are not a humorous people, and their temperament always impressed me as being of a dull and gloomy character In shrewdness of remark, and a certain cast-iron quaintness, the Yankees, or people of New England. unquestionably take the lead, as they do in most other evidences of intelligence But in travelling about, out of the large cities—as I have remarked in former parts of these volumes—I was quite oppressed by the prevailing seriousness and melancholy air of business, which was so general and unvarying, that at every new town I came to, I seemed to meet the very same people whom I had left behind me at the last Such defects as are perceptible in the national manners seem to me to be referable, in a great degree, to this cause, which has generated a dull, sullen persistence in coarse usages, and rejected the graces of life as undeserving of attention There is no doubt that Washington, who was always most scrupulous and exact on points of ceremony, perceived the tendency towards this mistake, even in his time, and did his utmost to correct it.

I cannot hold with other writers on these subjects, that the prevalence of various forms of dissent in America is in any way attributable to the non-existence there of an established church, indeed, I think the temper of the people, if it admitted of such an Institution being founded amongst them, would lead them to desert it, as a matter of course, merely because it was established. But, supposing it to exist, I doubt its probable efficacy in summoning the wandering sheep to one great fold, simply because of the immense amount of dissent which prevails at home, and because I do not find in America any one form of religion with which we in Europe, or even in England, are unacquainted Dissenters resort thither in great numbers, as other people do, simply because it is a land of resort, and great settlements of them are founded, because ground can be purchased, and towns and villages reared, where there were none of the human creation before But even the Shakers emigrated from England, our country is not unknown to Mr Joseph Smith, the apostle of Mormonism, or to his benighted disciples, I have beheld religious scenes myself in some of our populous towns which can hardly be surpassed by an American camp-meeting, and I am not aware that any instance of superstitious imposture on the one hand, and superstitious credulity on the other, has had its origin in the United States which we cannot more than parallel by the precedents of Mrs Southcote, Mary Tofts the rabbit-breeder, or even Mr Thom of Canterbury—which latter case arose some time after the dark ages had passed away

The Republican Institutions of America undoubtedly lead the people to assert their self-respect and their equality, but a traveller is bound to bear those Institutions in his mind, and not hastily to resent the near approach of a class of strangers, who, at home, would keep aloof. This characteristic, when it was tinctured with no foolish pride, and stopped short of no honest service, never offended me, and I very seldom, if ever, experienced its rude or unbecoming display. Once or twice it was comically developed, as in the following case, but this was an amusing incident, and not the rule, or

I wanted a pair of boots at a certain town, for I had none to travel in but those with the memorable cork soles, which were much too hot for the fiery decks of a steamboat I therefore sent a message to an artist in boots, importing, with my compliments, that I should be happy to see him, if he would do me the polite favour to call He very kindly returned for answer that he would "look round" at six o'clock that evening

I was lying on the sofa, with a book and a wine-glass, at about that time, when the door opened, and a gentleman in a stiff cravat, within a year or two on either side of thirty, entered, in his hat and gloves, walked up to the looking-glass. arranged his hair, took off his gloves, slowly produced a measure from the uttermost depths of his coat pocket, and requested me, in a languid tone, to "unfix" my straps I complied, but looked with some curiosity at his hat, which was still upon his head. It might have been that, or it might have been the heat—but he took it off Then he sat himself down on a chair opposite to me, rested an arm on each knee, and, leaning forward very much, took from the ground, by a great effort, the specimen of metropolitan workmanship which I had just pulled off, whistling pleasantly as he did so He turned it over and over, surveyed it with a contempt no language can express, and inquired if I wished him to fix me a boot like that? I courteously replied, that provided the boots were large enough, I would leave the rest to him, that if convenient and practicable, I should not object to their bearing some resemblance to the model then before him, but that I would be entirely guided by, and would beg to leave the whole subject to, his judgment and discre-"You an't partickler about this scoop in the heel, I suppose, then?" says he, "we don't foller that here" I repeated my last observation He looked at himself in the glass again, went closer to it to dash a grain or two of dust out of the corner of his eye, and settled his cravat All this time my leg and foot were in the air "Nearly ready, sir?" I inquired "Well, pretty nigh," he said, "keep steady" I kept as steady as I could, both in foot and face, and having by this time got the dust out, and found his pencil-case, he measured me, and made the necessary notes When he had finished, he fell into his old attitude, and taking up the boot again, mused for some time "And this," he said at last, "is an English boot, is it? This is a London boot, eh?" "That, sir," I replied, "is a London boot" He mused over it again, after the manner of Hamlet with Yorick's skull, nodded his head, as who should say, "I pity the institutions that led to the production of this boot!" rose, put up his pencil, notes, and paper-glancing at himself in the glass all the time—put on his hat, drew on his gloves very slowly, and finally walked out. When he had been gone about a minute, the door reopened, and his hat and his head reappeared. He tooked round the room, and at the boot again, which was still lying on the floor, appeared thoughtful for a minute, and then said, "Well, good arternoon" "Good afternoon, sir." said I, and that was the end of the interview

There is but one other head on which I wish to offer a remark, and that has reference to the public health vast a country, where there are thousands of millions of acres of land vet unsettled and uncleared, and on every rood of which vegetable decomposition is annually taking place where there are so many great rivers, and such opposite varieties of climate—there cannot fail to be a great amount of sickness at certain seasons But I may venture to say, after conversing with many members of the medical profes sion in America, that I am not singular in the opinion that much of the disease which does prevail might be avoided, if a few common precautions were observed Greater means of personal cleanliness are indispensable to this end, the custom of hastily swallowing large quantities of animal food three times a day, and rushing back to sedentary pursuits after each meal, must be changed, the gentler sex must go more wisely clad, and take more healthful exercise, and in the latter clause the males must be included also Above all, in public institutions, and throughout the whole of every town and city, the system of ventilation and drainage, and removal of impurities, requires to be thoroughly revised. There is no local Legislature in America which may not study Mr Chadwick's excellent Report-upon the Sanitary Condition of our Labouring Classes, with immense advantage

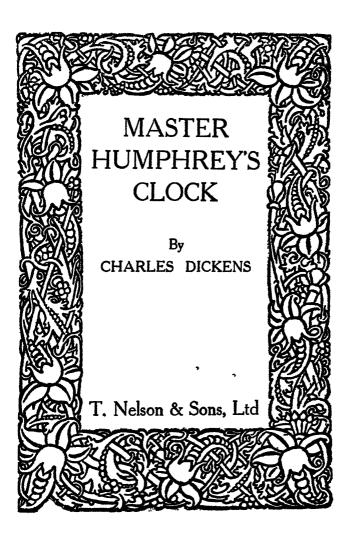

I have now arrived at the close of this book I have little reason to believe, from certain warnings I have had since I returned to England, that it will be tenderly or favourably received by the American people, and as I have written the Truth in relation to the mass of those who form their judgments and express their opinions, it will be seen that I have no desire to court, by any adventitious means, the popular applause

It is enough for me to know that what I have set down in these pages cannot cost me a single friend on the other side of the Atlantic, who is, in anything, deserving of the name. For the rest, I put my trust implicitly in the spirit in which they have been conceived and penned, and I can bide my time

I have made no reference to my reception, nor have I suffered it to influence me in what I have written, for, in either case, I should have offered but a sorry acknowledgment, compared with what I bear within my breast, towards those partial readers of my former books across the Water, who met me with an open hand, and not with one that closed upon an iron muzzle

At present, it is true, my abode may be a question of little or no import to anybody, but if I should carry my readers with me, as I hope to do, and there should spring up between them and me feelings of homely affection and regard attaching something of interest to matters ever so slightly connected with my fortunes or my speculations, even my place of residence might one day have a kind of charm for them Bearing this possible contingency in mind, I wish them to understand, in the outset, that they must never expect to know it

I am not a churlish old man Friendless I can never be, for all mankind are my kindred, and I am on ill terms with no one member of my great family But for many years I have led a lonely, solitary life,—what wound I sought to heal, what sorrow to forget, originally, matters not now, it is sufficient that retirement has become a habit with me, and that I am unwilling to break the spell which for so long a time has shed its quiet influence upon my home and heart

terers and peerless ladies, long since departed It is a silent, shady place, with a paved courtyard so full of echoes, that sometimes I am tempted to believe that faint responses to the noises of old times linger there yet, and that these ghosts of sound haunt my footsteps as I pace it up and down 'I am the more confirmed in this belief, because, of late years, the echoes that attend my walks have been less loud and marked than they were wont to be, and it is pleasanter to imagine in them the rustling of silk brocade, and the light step of some lovely girl, than to recognize in their altered note the failing tread of an old man

Those who like to read of brilliant rooms and gorgeous furniture would derive but little pleasure from a minute description of my simple dwelling. It is dear to me for the same reason that they would hold it in slight regard. Its worm-eaten doors, and low ceilings crossed by clumsy beams, its walls of wainscot, dark stairs, and gaping closets, its small chambers, communicating with each other by winding passages or narrow steps, its many nooks, scarce larger than its corner-cupboards, its very dust and culness, are all dear to me. The moth and spider are my constant tenants, for in my house the one basks in his long sleep, and the other plies his busy loom secure and undisturbed. I have a pleasure in thinking on a summer's day how many butterflies have sprung for the first time into light and sunshine from some dark corner of these old walls.

When I first came to live here, which was many years ago, the neighbours were curious to know who I was, and whence I came, and why I lived so much alone. As time went on, and they still remained unsatisfied on these points, I became the centre of a popular ferment, extending for half a mile round, and in one direction for a full mile. Various rumours were circulated to my prejudice. I was a spy, an infidel, a conjurer, a kidnapper of children, a refugee, a priest, a monster. Mothers caught up their infants and ran into their houses as I passed, men eyed me spitefully, and muttered threats and curses. I was the object of suspicion and distrust—ay, of downright hatred too.

But when in course of time they found I did no harm. but, on the contrary, inclined towards them despite their unjust usage, they began to relent I found my footsteps no longer dogged, as they had often been before, and observed that the women and children no longer retreated. but would stand and gaze at me as I passed their doors I took this for a good omen, and waited patiently for better times By degrees I began to make friends among these humble folks, and though they were yet shy of speaking, would give them "good-day," and so pass on In a little time, those whom I had thus accosted would make a point of coming to their doors and windows at the usual hour, and nod or courtesy to me, children, too, came timidly within my reach, and ran away quite scared when I patted their heads and bade them be good at school These little people soon grew more familiar From exchanging mere words of course with my older neighbours, I gradually became their friend and adviser, the depositary of their cares and sorrows, and sometimes, it may be, the reliever, in my small way, of their distresses And now I never walk abroad but pleasant recognitions and smiling faces wait on Master Humphrey

It was a whim of mine, perhaps as a whet to the curiosity of my neighbours, and a kind of retaliation upon them for their suspicions—it was, I say, a whim of mine, when I first took up my abode in this place, to acknowledge no other name than Humphrey With my detractors, I was Ugly Humphrey When I began to convert them into friends, I was Mr Humphrey and Old Mr Humphrey At length I settled down into plain Master Humphrey, which was understood to be the title most pleasant to my ear, and so completely a matter of course has it become, that sometimes when I am taking my morning walk in my little courtyard, I overhear my barber-who has a profound respect for me, and would not, I am sure, abridge my honours for the world-holding forth on the other side of the wall, touching the state of "Master Humphrey's" health, and communicating to some friend the substance of the conversation that he and Master Humphrey have had together in the course of the shaving which he has just concluded.

That I may not make acquaintance with my readers under false pretences, or give them cause to complain hereafter that I have withheld any matter which it was essential for them to have learnt at first, I wish them to know—and I smile sorrowfully to think that the time has been when the confession would have given me pain—that I am a misshapen, deformed old man

I have never been made a misanthrope by this cause I have never been stung by any insult, nor wounded by any jest upon my crooked figure. As a child I was melancholy and timid, but that was because the gentle consideration paid to my misfortune sunk deep into my spirit and made me sad, even in those early days. I was but a very young creature when my poor mother died, and yet I remember that often when I hung around her neck, and oftener still when I played about the room before her, she would catch me to her bosom, and bursting into tears, would soothe me with every term of fondness and affection. God knows I was a happy child at those times,—happy to nestle in her breast,—happy to weep when she did,—happy in not knowing why

These occasions are so strongly impressed upon my memory, that they seemed to have occupied whole years I had numbered very, very few when they ceased for ever, but before then their meaning had been revealed to me

I do not know whether all children are imbued with a quick perception of childish grace and beauty, and a strong love for it, but I was I had no thought that I remember, either that I possessed it myself or that I lacked it, but I admired it with an intensity that I cannot describe A little knot of playmates—they must have been beautiful, for I see them now—were clustered one day round my mother's knee in eager admiration of some picture representing a group of infant angels, which she held in her hand Whose the picture was, whether it was familiar to me or otherwise, or how all the children came to be there, I forget, I have some dim thought it was my birthday, but the beginning of my recollection is that we were all together in a garden, and it was summer weather,—I am sure of that, for one of the little girls had roses in her sash.

There were many lovely angels in this picture, and I remember the fancy coming upon me to point out which of them represented each child there, and that when I had gone through my companions, I stopped and hesitated, wondering which was most like me — I remember the children looking at each other, and my turning red and hot, and their crowding round to kiss me, saying that they loved me all the same, and then, and when the old sorrow came into my dear mother's mild and tender look, the truth broke upon me for the first time, and I knew, while watching my awkward and ungainly sports, how keenly she had felt for her poor crippled boy

I used frequently to dream of it afterwards, and now my heart aches for that child as if I had never been he, when I think how often he awoke from some fairy change to his own old form, and sobbed himself to sleep again

Well, well,—all those sorrows are past. My glancing at them may not be without its use, for it may help in some measure to explain why I have all my life been attached to the inanimate objects that people my chamber, and how I have come to look upon them rather in the light of old and constant friends, than as mere chairs and tables which a little money could replace at will

Chief and first among all these is my Clock,—my old, cheerful, companionable Clock How can I ever convey to others an idea of the comfort and consolation that this old Clock has been for years to me!

It is associated with my earliest recollections. It stood upon the staircase at home (I call it home still mechanically), nigh sixty years ago. I like it for that, but it is not on that account, nor because it is a quaint old thing in a huge oaken case curiously and richly carved, that I prize it as I do. I incline to it as if it were alive, and could understand and give me back the love I bear it

And what other thing that has not life could cheer me as it does? what other thing that has not life (I will not say how few things that have) could have proved the same patient, true, untiring friend? How often have I sat in the long winter evenings feeling such society in its cricket-voice, that raising my eyes from my book and looking gratefully towards it, the face reddened by the glow of the shining fire has seemed to relax from its staid expression and to regard me kindly! how often in the summer twi light, when my thoughts have wandered back to a melancholy past, have its regular whisperings recalled them to the calm and peaceful present! how often in the dead tranquility of night has its bell broken the oppressive silence, and seemed to give me assurance that the old clock was still a faithful watcher at my chamber-door! My easy-chair, my desk, my ancient furniture, my very books, I can scarcely bring myself to love even these last like my old clock

It stands in a snug corner, midway between the fireside and a low arched door leading to my bedroom. Its fame is diffused so extensively throughout the neighbourhood, that I have often the satisfaction of hearing the publican, or the baker, and sometimes even the parish-clerk, petitioning my housekeeper (of whom I shall have much to say by-and-by) to inform him the exact time by Master Humphrey's clock. My barber, to whom I have referred, would sooner believe it than the sun. Nor are these its only distinctions. It has acquired, I am happy to say, another, inseparably connecting it not only with my enjoyments and reflections, but with those of other men, as I shall now relate

I lived alone here for a long time without any friend or acquaintance. In the course of my wanderings by night and day, at all hours and seasons, in city streets and quiet country parts, I came to be familiar with certain faces, and to take it to heart as quite a heavy disappointment if they failed to present themselves each at its accustomed spot But these were the only friends I knew, and beyond them I had none

It happened, however, when I had gone on thus for a long time, that I formed an acquaintance with a deaf gentleman, which ripened into intimacy and close companionship. To this hour, I am ignorant of his name. It is his humour to conceal it, or he has a reason and purpose for so doing. In either case, I feel that he has a right to require a return of the trust he has reposed, and as he has never sought to discover my secret, I have never sought to penetrate his There may have been something in this tacit confidence in each other flattering and pleasant to us both, and it may have imparted in the beginning an additional zest, perhaps, to our friendship Be this as it may, we have grown to be like brothers, and still I only know him as the deaf gentleman

I have said that retirement has become a habit with me When I add, that the deaf gentleman and I have two friends, I communicate nothing which is inconsistent with that declaration I spend many hours of every day in solitude and study, have no friends or change of friends but these, only see them at stated periods, and am supposed to be of a retired spirit by the very nature and object of our association

We are men of secluded habits, with something of a cloud upon our early fortunes, whose enthusiasm, nevertheless, has not cooled with age, whose spirit of romance is not yet quenched, who are content to ramble through the world in a pleasant dream, rather than ever waken again to its harsh realities. We are alchemists who would extract the essence of perpetual youth from dust and ashes, tempt coy Truth in many light and airy forms from the bottom of her well, and discover one crumb of comfort or one grain of good in the commonest and least-regarded matter that passes through our crucible. Spirits of past times, creatures of imagination, and people of to-day are alike the objects of our seeking, and, unlike the objects of search with most philosophers, we can insure their coming at our command.

The deaf gentleman and I first began to begule our days with these fancies, and our nights in communicating them to each other. We are now four. But in my room there are six old chairs, and we have decided that the two empty seats shall always be placed at our table when we meet, to remind us that we may yet increase our company by that number, if we should find two men to our mind. When one among us dies, his chair will always be set in its usual place, but never occupied again, and I have caused my will to be so drawn out, that when we are all dead the house shall be shut up, and the vacant chairs still left in their accustomed places. It is pleasant to think that even then our shades may, perhaps, assemble together as of vore we did, and join in ghostly converse

One night in every week, as the clock strikes ten, we meet At the second stroke of two, I am alone

And now shall I tell how that my old servant, besides giving us note of time, and ticking cheerful encouragement of our proceedings, lends its name to our society, which for its punctuality and my love is christened "Master Humphrey's Clock"? Now shall I tell how that in the bottom of the old dark closet, where the steady pendulum throbs and beats with healthy action, though the pulse of him who made it stood still long ago, and never moved again, there are piles of dusty papers constantly placed there by our hands, that we may link our enjoyments with my old friend, and draw means to begule time from the heart of time itself? Shall I, or can I, tell with what a secret pride I open this repository when we meet at night, and still find new store of pleasure in my dear old Clock?

Friend and companion of my solitude! mine is not a selfish love, I would not keep your merits to myself, but disperse something of pleasant association with your image through the whole wide world, I would have men couple with your name cheerful and healthy thoughts, I would have them believe that you keep true and honest time, and how it would gladden me to know that they recognized some hearty English work in Master Humphrey's Clock!

It is my intention constantly to address my readers from the chimney-corner, and I would fain hope that such accounts as I shall give them of our histories and proceedings, our quiet speculations or more busy adventures, will never be unwelcome. Lest, however, I should grow prolix in the outset by lingering too long upon our little association, confounding the enthusiasm with which I regard this chief happiness of my life with that minor degree of interest which those to whom I address myself may be supposed to feel for it, I have deemed it expedient to break off as they have seen

But still clinging to my old friend, and naturally desirous that all its merits should be known, I am tempted to open (somewhat irregularly and against our laws, I must admit) the clock-case. The first roll of paper on which I lay my hand is in the writing of the deaf gentleman. I shall have to speak of him in my next paper, and how can I better approach that welcome task than by prefacing it with a production of his own pen, consigned to the safe keeping of my honest Clock by his own hand?

INTRODUCTION TO THE GIANT CHRONICLES

Once upon a time, that is to say, in this our time,—the exact year, month, and day are of no matter,—there dwelt in the city of London a substantial citizen, who united in his single person the dignities of wholesale fruiterer, alderman, common-councilman, and member of the worshipful Company of Patten-makers, who had superadded to these extraordinary distinctions the important post and title of Sheriff, and who at length, and to crown all, stood next in rotation for the high and honourable office of Lord Mayor

He was a very substantial citizen indeed. His face was like the full moon in a fog, with two little holes punched out for his eyes, a very ripe pear stuck on for his nose, and a wide gash to serve for a mouth. The girth of his waistcoat was hung up and lettered in his tailor's shop as an extraordinary curiosity. He breathed like a heavy snorer, and his voice in speaking came thickly forth, as if it were oppressed and stifled by feather-beds. He trod the ground like an elephant, and eat and drank like—like nothing but an alderman, as he was

This worthy citizen had risen to his great eminence from small beginnings. He had once been a very lean, weazen little boy, never dreaming of carrying such a weight of flesh upon his bones or of money in his pockets, and glad enough to take his dinner at a baker's door, and his tea at a pump. But he had long ago forgotten all this, as it was proper that a wholesale fruiterer, alderman, common-councilman, member of the worshipful Company of Patten-makers, past sheriff, and, above all, a Lord Mayor that was to be, should, and he never forgot it more com pletely in all his life than on the eighth of November in the year of his election to the great golden civic chair, which was the day before his grand dinner at Guildhall

It happened that as he sat that evening all alone in his counting-house, looking over the bill of fare for next day, and checking off the fat capons in fifties, and the turtlesoup by the hundred quarts, for his private amusement, it happened that as he sat alone occupied in these pleasant calculations, a strange man came in and asked him how he did, adding, "If I am half as much changed as you, sir, you have no recollection of me, I am sure "

The strange man was not over and above well dressed. and was very far from being fat or rich-looking in any sense of the word, yet he spoke with a kind of modest confidence, and assumed an easy, gentlemanly sort of an air, to which nobody but a rich man can lawfully presume Besides this, he interrupted the good citizen just as he had reckoned three hundred and seventy-two fat capons, and was carrying them over to the next column, and as if that were not aggravation enough, the learned recorder for the city of London had only ten minutes previously gone out at that very same door, and had turned round and said, "Good-night, my lord" Yes, he had said, "my lord,"-he, a man of birth and education, of the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law,-he who had an uncle in the House of Commons, and an aunt almost but not quite in the House of Lords (for she had married a feeble peer, and made him vote as she liked),-he, this man, this learned recorder, had said, "mv lord" "I'll not wait till to-morrow to give you your title, my Lord Mayor," says he, with a bow and a smile, "you are Lord Mayor de facto, if not de jure. Good-night, my lord "

The Lord Mayor elect thought of this, and turning to the stranger, and sternly bidding him "go out of his private counting-house," brought forward the three hundred and seventy-two fat capons, and went on with his account.

"Do you remember," said the other, stepping forward, —"do you remember little Joe Toddyhigh?"

The port wine fled for a moment from the fruiterer's nose as he muttered, "Joe Toddyhigh! What about Joe Toddyhigh?"

"I am Joe Toddyhigh," cried the visitor "Look at me, look hard at me,—harder, harder You know me now? You know little Joe again? What a happiness to us both, to meet the very night before your grandeur! Oh! give me your hand, Jack,—both hands,—both, for the sake of old times"

"You pinch me, sir You're a-hurting of me," said the Lord Mayor elect, pettishly "Don't,—suppose anybody should come,—Mr Toddyhigh, sir"

"Mr Toddyhigh!" repeated the other, ruefully

"Oh, don't bother," said the Lord Mayor elect, scratching his head "Dear me! Why, I thought you was dead What a fellow you are!"

Indeed, it was a pretty state of things, and worthy the tone of vexation and disappointment in which the Lord Mayor spoke—Joe Toddyhigh had been a poor boy with him at Hull, and had oftentimes divided his last penny and parted his last crust to relieve his wants, for though Joe was a destitute child in those times, he was as faithful and affectionate in his friendship as ever man of might could be. They parted one day to seek their fortunes in different directions—Joe went to sea, and the now wealthy citizen begged his way to London—They separated with many tears, like foolish fellows as they were, and agreed to remain fast friends, and if they lived, soon to communicate again

When he was an errand-boy, and even in the early days of his apprenticeship, the citizen had many a time trudged to the Post-office to ask if there were any letter from poor little Joe, and had gone home again with tears in his eyes, when he found no news of his only friend. The world is a wide place, and it was a long time before the letter came; when it did, the writer was forgotten. It turned from white to yellow from lying in the Post-office with nobody to claim it, and in course of time was torn up with five hundred others, and sold for waste-paper And now at last, and when it might least have been expected, here was this Joe Toddyhigh turning up and claiming acquaintance with a great public character, who on the morrow would be cracking jokes with the Prime Minister of England, and who had only, at any time during the next twelve months, to say the word, and he could shut up Temple Bar, and make it no tholoughfare for the king himself!

"I am sure I don't know what to say, Mr Toddyhigh," said the Lord Mayor elect, "I really don't It's very inconvenient I'd sooner have given twenty pound,—it's very inconvenient, really "

A thought had come into his mind, that perhaps his old friend might say something passionate which would give him an excuse for being angry himself. No such thing Joe looked at him steadily, but very timidly, and did not open his lips

"Of course I shall pay you what I owe you," said the Lord Mayor elect, fidgeting in his chair "You lent me-I think it was a shilling or some small coin-when we parted company, and that of course I shall pay with good I can pay my way with any man, and always If you look into the Mansion House the day after to-morrow,-some time after dusk,-and ask for my private clerk, you'll find he has a draft for you I haven't got time to say anything more just now, unless,"-he hesitated, for, coupled with a strong desire to glitter for once in all his glory in the eyes of his former companion, was a distrust of his appearance, which might be more shabby than he could tell by that feeble light,—"unless vou'd like to come to the dinner to-morrow I don't mind your having this ticket, if you like to take it A great many people would give their ears for it, I can tell you"

His old friend took the card without speaking a word, and instantly departed. His sunburnt face and grey hair were present to the citizen's mind for a moment, but by the time he reached three hundred and eighty-one fat capons, he had quite forgotten him

Joe Toddyhigh had never been in the capital of Europe before, and he wandered up and down the streets that night amazed at the number of churches and other public buildings, the splendour of the shops, the riches that were heaped up on every side the glare of light in which they were displayed, and the concourse of people who hurried to and fro, indifferent, apparently, to all the wonders that surrounded them But in all the long streets and broad squares there were none but strangers, it was quite a relief to turn down a by-way and hear his own footsteps on the pavement He went home to his inn, thought that London was a dreary, desolate place, and felt disposed to doubt the existence of one true-hearted man in the whole worshipful Company of Patten-makers Finally, he went to bed, and dreamed that he and the Lord Mayor elect were boys again

He went next day to the dinner, and when in a burst of light and music, and in the midst of splendid decorations and surrounded by brilliant company, his former friend appeared at the head of the Hall, and was hailed with shouts and cheering, he cheered and shouted with the best, and for the moment could have cried. The next moment he cursed his weakness in behalf of a man so changed and selfish, and quite hated a jolly-looking old gentleman opposite for declaring himself in the pride of his heart a Patten-

As the banquet proceeded, he took more and more to heart the rich citizen's unkindness, and that, not from any envy, but because he felt that a man of his state and fortune could all the better afford to recognize an old friend, even if he were poor and obscure. The more he thought of this, the more lonely and sad he felt. When the company dispersed and adjourned to the ball-room, he paced the hall and passages alone, ruminating in a very melancholy condition upon the disappointment he had experienced

It chanced, while he was lounging about in this moody state, that he stumbled upon a flight of stairs, dark, steep, and narrow, which he ascended without any thought about the matter, and so came into a little music-gallery, empty and deserted From this elevated post, which commanded the whole hall, he amused himself in looking down upon the attendants who were clearing away the fragments of the feast very lazily, and drinking out of all the bottles and glasses with most commendable perseverance

When he awoke, he thought there must be something the matter with his eyes, but, rubbing them a little, he soon found that the moonlight was really streaming through the east window, that the lamps were all extinguished, and that he was alone. He listened, but no distant murmur in the echoing passages, not even the shutting of a door, broke the deep silence, he groped his way down the stairs, and found that the door at the bottom was locked on the other side. He began now to comprehend that he must have slept a long time, that he had been overlooked, and was shut up there for the night

His first sensation, perhaps, was not altogether a comfortable one, for it was a dark, chilly, earthy-smelling place, and something too large, for a man so situated, to feel at home in However, when the momentary consternation of his surprise was over, he made light of the accident, and resolved to feel his way up the stairs again, and make himself as comfortable as he could in the gallery until morning As he turned to execute this purpose, he heard the clocks

Any such invasion of a dead stillness as the striking of distant clocks, causes it to appear the more intense and insupportable when the sound has ceased. He listened with strained attertion in the hope that some clock, lagging behind its fellows, had yet to strike,—looking all the time into the profound darkness before him, until it seemed to weave itself into a black tissue, patterned with a hundred reflections of his own eyes. But the bells had all pealed out their warning for that once, and the gust of wind that moaned through the place seemed cold and heavy with their iron breath

The time and circumstances were favourable to reflection He tried to keep his thoughts to the current, unpleasant though it was, in which they had moved all day, and to think with what a romantic feeling he had looked forward to shaking his old friend by the hand before he died, and what a wide and cruel difference there was between the meeting they had had, and that which he had so often and so long anticipated Still, he was disordered by waking to such sudden loneliness, and could not prevent his mind from running upon odd tales of people of undoubted courage, who, being shut up by night in vaults or churches, or other dismal places, had scaled great heights to get out, and fled from silence as they had never done from danger This brought to his mind the moonlight through the window, and bethinking himself of it, he groped his way back up the crooked stairs,—but very stealthily, as though he were fearful of being overheard

He was very much astonished when he approached the gallery again, to see a light in the building still more so, on advancing hastily and looking round, to observe no visible source from which it could proceed. But how much greater yet was his astonishment at the spectacle which

this light revealed

The statues of the two giants, Gog and Magog, each above fourteen feet in height, those which succeeded to still older and more barbarous figures, after the Great Fire of London, and which stand in the Guildhall to this day, were endowed with life and motion. These guardian genii of the City had quitted their pedestals, and reclined in easy attitudes in the great stained-glass window. Between them was an ancient cask, which seemed to be full of wine, for the younger Giant, clapping his huge hand upon it, and throwing up his mighty leg, burst into an expliting laugh, which reverberated through the hall like thunder.

Joe Toddyhigh instinctively stooped down, and, more dead than alive, felt his hair stand on end, his knees knock together, and a cold damp break out upon his forehead But even at that minute curiosity prevailed over every other feeling, and somewhat reassured by the good-humour of the Giants and their apparent unconsciousness of his presence, he crouched in a corner of the gallery, in as small a space as he could, and, peeping between the rails, observed them

It was then that the elder Giant, who had a flowing grey beard, raised his thoughtful eyes to his companion's face, and in a grave and solemn voice addressed him thus.—

FIRST NIGHT OF THE GIANT CHRONICLES

Turning towards his companion, the elder Giant uttered

these words in a grave, majestic tone -

"Magog, does boisterous mirth beseem the Giant Warder of this ancient city? Is this becoming demeanour for a watchful spirit over whose bodiless head so many years have rolled, so many changes swept like empty air—in whose impalpable nostrils the scent of blood and crime, pestilence, cruelty, and horror, has been familiar as breath to mortals—in whose sight Time has gathered in the harvest of centuries, and garnered so many crops of human pride, affections, hopes, and sorrows? Bethink you of our compact The night wanes, feasting, revelry, and music have encroached upon our usual hours of solitude, and morning will be here apace Ere we are stricken mute again, bethink you of our compact"

Pronouncing these latter words with more of impatience than quite accorded with his apparent age and gravity, the Giant raised a long pole (which he still bears in his hand) and tapped his brother Giant rather smartly on the head, indeed, the blow was so smartly administered, that the latter quickly withdrew his lips from the cask, to which they had been applied, and, catching up his shield and halberd, assumed an attitude of defence. His irritation was but momentary, for he laid these weapons aside as hastily as he had assumed them, and said as he did so -

"You know, Gog, old friend, that when we animate these shapes which the Londoners of old assigned (and not unworthily) to the guardian genii of their city, we are susceptible of some of the sensations which belong to human kind. Thus when I taste wine, I feel blows, when I relish the one, I disrelish the other. Therefore, Gog, the more especially as your arm is none of the lightest, keep your good staff by your side, else we may chance to differ. Peace be between us!"

"Amen!" said the other, leaning his staff in the winlow-corner "Why did you laugh just now?"

"To think," replied the Giant Magog, laying his hand upon the cask, "of him who owned this wine, and kept it in a cellar hoarded from the light of day, for thirty years, —'till it should be fit to drink,' quoth he He was two-score and ten years old when he buried it beneath his house, and yet never thought that he might be scarcely 'fit to drink' when the wine became so I wonder it never occurred to him to make himself unfit to be eaten There is very little of him left by this time"

"The night is waning," said Gog, mournfully

"I know it," replied his companion, "and I see you are impatient But look Through the eastern window—placed opposite to us, that the first beams of the rising sun may every morning gild our giant faces—the moonrays fall upon the pavement in a stream of light that to my fancy sinks through the cold stone and gushes into the old crypt below The night is scarcely past its noon, and our great charge is sleeping heavily"

They ceased to speak, and looked upward at the moon The sight of their large, black, rolling eyes filled Joe Toddyhigh with such horror that he could scarcely draw his breath Still they took no note of him, and appeared to believe themselves quite alone

"Our compact," said Magog, after a pause, "is, if I understand it, that, instead of watching here in silence through the dreary nights, we entertain each other with stories of our past experience, with tales of the past, the present, and the future, with legends of London and her sturdy citizens from the old simple times. That every night at midnight, when St Paul's bell tolls out one, and we may move and speak, we thus discourse, nor leave such themes, till the first grey gleam of day shall strike us dumb. Is that our bargain, brother?"

"Yes," said the Giant Gog, "that is the league between us who guard this city, by day in spirit, and by night in body also, and never on ancient holidays have its conduits run wine more merrily than we will pour forth our legendary lore. We are old chroniclers from this time hence. The crumbled walls encircle us once more, the postern-gates are closed, the drawbridge is up, and pent its narrow den beneath, the water foams and struggles with the sunken starlings Jerkins and quarter-staves are in the streets again, the nightly watch is set, the rebel, sad and lonely in his Tower dungeon, tries to sleep and weeps for home and children. Aloft upon the gates and walls are noble heads glaring fiercely down upon the dreaming city, and vexing the hungry dogs that scent them in the air, and tear the ground beneath with dismal howlings. The axe, the block, the rack, in their dark chambers give signs of recent use. The Thames, floating past long lines of cheerful windows whence come a burst of music and a stream of light, bears suddenly to the Palace wall the last red stain brought on the tide from Traitor's Gate. But your pardon, brother. The night wears, and I am talking idly."

The other Giant appeared to be entirely of this opinion, for during the foregoing rhapsody of his fellow-sentinel he had been scratching his head with an air of comical uneasiness, or rather with an air that would have been very comical if he had been a dwarf or an ordinary sized man He winked too, and though it could not be doubted for a moment that he winked to himself, still he certainly cocked his enormous eye towards the gallery where the listener was concealed. Nor was this all, for he gaped, and when he gaped, Joe was horribly reminded of the popular prejudice on the subject of giants, and of their fabled power of smelling out Englishmen, however closely concealed

His alarm was such that he nearly swooned, and it was some little time before his power of sight or hearing was restored. When he recovered he found that the elder Giant was pressing the younger to commence the Chronicles, and that the latter was endeavouring to excuse himself, on the ground that the night was far spent, and it would be better to wait until the next. Well assured by this that he was certainly about to begin directly, the listener collected his faculties by a great effort, and distinctly heard Magog express himself to the following effect —

In the sixteenth century and in the reign of Queen Elizabeth of glorious memory (albeit her golden days are sadly rusted with blood), there lived in the city of London a bold young 'prentice who loved his master's daughter There were no doubt within the walls a great many 'prentices in this condition, but I speak of only one, and his name was Hugh Graham

This Hugh was apprenticed to an honest Bowyer who dwelt in the ward of Cheype, and was rumoured to possess great wealth. Rumour was quite as infallible in those days as at the present time, but it happened then as now to be sometimes right by accident. It stumbled upon the truth when it gave the old Bowyer a mint of money. His trade had been a profitable one in the time of King Henry the Eighth, who encouraged English archery to the utmost, and he had been prudent and discreet. Thus it came to pass that Mistress Alice, his only daughter, was the richest heiress in all his wealthy ward. Young Hugh had often maintained with staff and cudgel that she was the handsomest. To do him justice, I believe she was

If he could have gained the heart of pretty Mistress Alice by knocking this conviction into stubborn people's heads, Hugh would have no cause to fear But though the Bowyer's daughter smiled in secret to hear of his doughty deeds for her sake, and though her little waitingwoman reported all her smiles (and many more) to Hugh, and though he was at a vast expense in kisses and small coin to recompense her fidelity, he made no progress in his love He durst not whisper it to Mistress Alice save on sure encouragement, and that she never gave him glance of her dark eye as she sat at the door on a summer's evening after prayer-time, while he and the neighbouring 'prentices exercised themselves in the street with blunted sword and buckler, would fire Hugh's blood so that none could stand before him, but then she glanced at others quite as kindly as on him, and where was the use of cracking crowns if Mistress Alice smiled upon the cracked as well as on the cracker?

Still Hugh went on, and loved her more and more He thought of her all day, and dreamed of her all night long. He treasured up her every word and gesture, and had a palpitation of the heart whenever he heard her footstep on the stairs or her voice in an adjoining room. To him, the old Bowyer's house was haunted by an angel, there was enchantment in the air and space in which she moved — It would have been no miracle to Hugh if flowers had sprung from the rush-strewn floors beneath the tread of lovely Mistress Alice

Never did 'prentice long to distinguish himself in the eyes of his lady-love so ardently as Hugh. Sometimes he pictured to himself the house taking fire by night, and he, when all drew back in fear, rushing through flame and smoke, and bearing her from the ruins in his arms. At other times he thought of a rising of fierce rebels, an attack upon the city, a strong assault upon the Bowyer's house in particular, and he falling on the threshold pierced with numberless wounds in defence of Mistress Alice. If he could only enact some prodigy of valour, do some wonderful deed, and let her know that she had inspired it, he thought he could die contented.

Sometimes the Bowyer and his daughter would go out to supper with a worthy citizen at the fashionable hour of six o'clock, and on such occasions Hugh, wearing his blue prentice cloak as gallantly as 'prentice might, would attend with a lantern and his trusty club to escort them home. These were the brightest moments of his life. To hold the light while Mistress Alice picked her steps, to touch her hand as he helped her over broken ways, to have her leaning on his arm,—it sometimes even came to that —this was happiness indeed!

When the nights were fair, Hugh followed in the rear, his eyes riveted on the graceful figure of the Bowyer's daughter as she and the old man moved on before him So they threaded the narrow winding streets of the city, now passing beneath the overhanging gables of old wooden houses whence creaking signs projected into the street, and now emerging from some dark and frowning gateway into the clear moonlight. At such times, or when the shouts of straggling brawlers met her ear, the Bowyer's daughter would look timidly back at Hugh, beseeching him to draw nearer, and then how he grasped his club and longed to do battle with a dozen rufflers, for the love of Mistress Alice!

The old Bowyer was in the habit of lending money on interest to the gallants of the Court, and thus it happened that many a richly dressed gentleman dismounted at his door. More waving plumes and gallant steeds, indeed, were seen at the Bowyer's house, and more embroidered silks and velvets sparkled in his dark shop and darker private closet, than at any merchant's in the city. In those times no less than in the present it would seem that the richest-looking cavaliers often wanted money the most.

Of these glittering clients there was one who always came alone He was nobly mounted, and, having no attendant, gave his horse in charge to Hugh while he and the Bowyer were closeted within Once as he sprung into the saddle Mistress Alice was seated at an upper window, and before she could withdraw he had doffed his jewelled cap and kissed his hand Hugh watched him caracoling down the street, and burnt with indignation But how much deeper was the glow that reddened in his cheeks when, raising his eyes to the casement, he saw that Alice watched the stranger too!

He came again and often, each time arrayed more gaily than before, and still the little casement showed him Mistress Alice At length, one heavy day she fled from home It had cost her a hard struggle, for all her old father's gifts were strewn about her chamber as if she had parted from them one by one, and knew that the time must come when these tokens of his love would wring her heart,—yet she was gone

She left a letter commending her poor father to the care of Hugh, and wishing he might be happier than ever he could have been with her, for he deserved the love of a better and a purer heart than she had to bestow The old man's forgiveness (she said) she had no power to ask, but she prayed God to bless him,—and so ended with a blot upon the paper where her tears had follow the paper where her tears had fallen At first the old man's wrath was k

At first the old man's wrath was kindled, and he carried his wrong to the Queen's throne itself, but there was no redress, he learnt at Court, for his daughter had been conveyed abroad This afterwards appeared to be the truth as there came from France after an interval of several years, a letter in her hand It was written in trembling characters, and almost illegible Little could be made out save that she often thought of home and her old dear pleasant room,—and that she had dreamt her father was dead and had not blessed her,—and that her heart was breaking

The poor old Bowyer lingered on, never suffering Hugh to quit his sight, for he knew now that he had loved his daughter, and that was the only link that bound him to earth. It broke at length and he died, bequeathing his old 'prentice his trade and all his wealth, and solemnly charging him with his last breath to revenge his child if ever he who had worked her misery crossed his path in life again.

From the time of Alice's flight, the tilting-ground, the fields, the fencing-school, the summer-evening sports, knew Hugh no more His spirit was dead within him He rose to great eminence and repute among the citizens, but was seldom seen to smile, and never mingled in their revelries or rejoicings Brave, humane, and generous, he was beloved by all He was pitied too by those who knew his story, and these were so many that when he walked along the streets alone at dusk, even the rude common people doffed their caps and mingled a rough air of sympathy with their respect

One night in May—it was her birthnight, and twenty years since she had left her home—Hugh Graham sat in the room she had hallowed in his boyish days. He was now a grey-haired man, though still in the prime of life. Old thoughts had borne him company for many hours, and the chamber had gradually grown quite dark, when he was roused by a low knocking at the outer door

He hastened down, and opening it saw by the light of a lamp which he had seized upon the way a female figure crouching in the portal. It hurried swiftly past him and glided up the stairs. He looked for pursuers. There were none in sight. No, not one

He was inclined to think it a vision of his own brain, when suddenly a vague suspicion of the truth flashed upon his mind. He barred the door, and hastened wildly back Yes, there she was,—there, in the chamber he had quitted,

—there in her old innocent happy home, so changed that none but he could trace one gleam of what she had been, —there upon her knees,—with her hands clasped in agony and shame before her burning face

"My God, my God!" she cried, "now strike me dead! Though I have brought death and shame and sorrow on this roof, oh, let me die at home in mercy!"

There was no tear upon her face then, but she trembled and glanced round the chamber Everything was in its old place. Her bed looked as if she had risen from it but that morning. The sight of these familiar objects, marking the dear remembrance in which she had been held, and the blight she had brought upon herself, was more than the woman's better nature that had carried her there could bear

She wept and fell upon the ground

A rumour was spread about, in a few days' time, that the Bowyer's cruel daughter had come home, and that Master Graham had given her lodging in his house rumoured too that he had resigned her fortune, in order that she might bestow it in acts of charity, and that he had vowed to guard her in her solitude, but that they were never to see each other more These rumours greatly incensed all virtuous wives and daughters in the ward, especially when they appeared to receive some corroboration from the circumstance of Master Graham taking up his abode in another tenement hard by The estimation in which he was held, however, forbade any questioning on the subject, and as the Bowyer's house was close shut up, and nobody came forth when public shows and festivities were in progress, or to flaunt in the public walks, or to buy new fashions at the mercers' booths, all the well-conducted females agreed among themselves that there could be no woman there

These reports had scarcely shed away when the wonder of every good citizen, male and female, was utterly absorbed and swallowed up by a Royal Proclamation, in which her Majesty, strongly censuring the practice of wearing long Spanish rapiers of preposterous length (as being a bullying and swaggering custom, tending to bloodshed and public disorder), commanded that on a particular day therein named, certain grave citizens should repair to the city gates and there, in public, break all rapiers worn or carried by persons claiming admission, that exceeded, though it were only by a quarter of an inch, three standard feet in length

Royal Proclamations usually take their course, let the public wonder never so much On the appointed day two citizens of high repute took up their stations at each of the gates, attended by a party of the city guard, the main body to enforce the Queen's will, and take custody of all such rebels (if any) as might have the temerity to dispute it and a few to bear the standard measures and instruments for reducing all unlawful sword-blades to the prescribed dimensions. In pursuance of these arrangements, Master Graham and another were posted at Lud Gate, on the hill before St Paul's

A pretty numerous company were gathered together at this spot, for, besides the officers in attendance to enforce the proclamation, there was a motley crowd of lookers-on of various degrees, who raised from time to time such shouts and cries as the circumstances called forth spruce young courtier was the first who approached unsheathed a weapon of burnished steel that shone and glistened in the sun, and handed it with the newest air to the officer, who, finding it exactly three feet long, returned it with a bow. Thereupon the gallant raised his hat and crying, "God save the Queen!" passed on amidst the plaudits of the mob Then came another-a better courtier still—who wore a blade but two feet long, whereat the people laughed, much to the disparagement of his honour's dignity Then came a third, a sturdy old officer of the army, girded with a rapier at least a foot and a half beyond her Majesty's pleasure, at him they raised a great shout, and most of the spectators (but especially those who were armourers or cutlers) laughed very heartily at the breakage which would ensue But they were disappointed, for the old campaigner, coolly unbuckling his sword and bidding his servant carry it home again, passed through unarmed, to the great indignation of all the beholders They relieved themselves in some degree by hooting a tall blustering fellow with a prodigious weapon, who stopped short on coming in sight of the preparations, and after a little consideration turned back again But all this time no rapier had been broken, although it was high noon, and all cavaliers of any quality or appearance were taking their way towards St. Paul's churchyard

During these proceedings Master Graham had stood apart, strictly confining himself to the duty imposed upon him, and taking little heed of anything beyond He stepped forward now as a richly-dressed gentleman on foot, followed by a single attendant, was seen advancing up the hill

As this person drew nearer, the crowd stopped their clamour, and bent forward with eager looks Master Graham standing alone in the gateway, and the stranger coming slowly towards him, they seemed, as it were, set face to face The nobleman (for he looked one) had a haughty and disdainful air, which bespoke the slight estimation in which he held the citizen The citizen, on the other hand, preserved the resolute bearing of one who was not to be frowned down or daunted, and who cared very little for any nobility but that of worth and manhood It was perhaps some consciousness on the part of each, of these feelings in the other, that infused a more stern expression into their regards as they came closer together

"Your rapier, worthy sir!"

At the instant that he pronounced these words Graham started, and falling back some paces, laid his hand upon the dagger in his belt

"You are the man whose horse I used to hold before the Bowyer's door? You are that man? Speak!"

"Out, you 'prentice hound!" said the other

"You are he! I know you well now!" cried Graham
"Let no man step between us two, or I shall be his murderer" With that he drew his dagger, and rushed in upon him

The stranger had drawn his weapon from the scabbard ready for the scrutiny, before a word was spoken. He made a thrust at his assailant, but the dagger which Graham clutched in his left hand being the dirk in use at that time for parrying such blows, promptly turned the point aside. They closed. The dagger fell rattling on the ground and Graham, wresting his adversary's sword from his grasp.

plunged it through his heart As he drew it out it snapped in two, leaving a fragment in the dead man's body

All this passed so swiftly that the bystanders looked on without an effort to interfere, but the man was no sooner down than an uproar broke forth which rent the air. The attendant rushing through the gate proclaimed that his master, a nobleman, had been set upon and slain by a citizen, the word quickly spread from mouth to mouth, St Paul's Cathedral, and every book-shop, ordinary, and smoking-house in the Churchyard poured out its stream of cavaliers and their followers, who mingling together in a dense tumultuous body, struggled, sword in hand, towards the spot

With equal impetuosity, and stimulating each other by loud cries and shouts, the citizens and common people took up the quarrel on their side, and encircling Master Graham a hundred deep, forced him from the gate. In vain he waved the broken sword above his head, crying that he would die on London's threshold for their sacred homes. They bore him on, and ever keeping him in the midst, so that no man could attack him, fought their way into the city.

The clash of swords and roar of voices, the dust and heat and pressure, the trampling under foot of men, the distracted looks and shrieks of women at the windows above as they recognized their relatives or lovers in the crowd. the rapid tolling of alarm-bells, the furious rage and passion of the scene, were fearful Those who, being on the outskirts of each crowd, could use their weapons with effect, fought desperately, while those behind, maddened with baffled rage, struck at each other over the heads of those before them, and crushed their own fellows Wherever the broken sword was seen above the people's heads, towards that spot the cavalfers made a new rush one of these charges was marked by sudden gaps in the throng where men were trodden down, but as fast as they were made, the tide swept over them, and still the multitude pressed on again, a confused mass of swords, clubs, staves, broken plumes, fragments of rich cloaks and doublets, and angry bleeding faces, all mixed up together in mextricable disorder

The design of the people was to force Master Graham to take refuge in his dwelling, and to defend it until the authorities could interfere, or they could gain time for parley But either from ignorance or in the confusion of the moment they stopped at his old house, which was closely shut Some time was lost in beating the doors open and passing him to the front About a score of the boldest of the other party threw themselves into the torrent while this was being done, and reaching the door at the same moment with himself cut him off from his defenders

"I never will turn in such a righteous cause, so help me Heaven!" cried Graham, in a voice that at last made itself heard, and confronting them as he spoke "Least of all will I turn upon this threshold which owes its desolation to such men as ye I give no quarter, and I will have none! Strike!"

For a moment they stood at bay At that moment a shot from an unseen hand, apparently fired by some person who had gained access to one of the opposite houses, struck Graham in the brain, and he fell dead A low wail was heard in the air,—many people in the concourse cried that they had seen a spirit glide across the little casement window of the Bowyer's house—

A dead silence succeeded After a short time some of the flushed and heated throng laid down their arms and softly carried the body within doors. Others fell off or slunk away in knots of two or three, others whispered together in groups, and before a numerous guard which then rode up could muster in the street, it was nearly empty

Those who carried Master Graham to the bed upstairs were shocked to see a woman lying beneath the window with her hands clasped together. After trying to recover her in vain, they laid her near the citizen, who still retained, tightly grasped in his right hand, the first and last sword that was broken that day at Lud Gate

The Giant uttered these concluding words with sudden precipitation, and on the instant the strange light which had filled the hall faded away. Joe Toddyhigh glanced avoluntarily at the eastern window, and saw the first pale gleam of morning He turned his head again towards the other window in which the Giants had been seated. It was empty The cask of wine was gone, and he could dimly make out that the two great figures stood mute and motionless upon their pedestals

After rubbing his eyes and wondering for full half an hour, during which time he observed morning come creeping on apace, he yielded to the drowsiness which overpowered him and fell into a refreshing slumber. When he awoke it was broad day, the building was open, and workmen were busily engaged in removing the vestiges of last night's feast.

Stealing gently down the little stairs, and assuming the air of some early lounger who had dropped in from the street, he walked up to the foot of each pedestal in turn. and attentively examined the figure it supported could be no doubt about the features of either, he recollected the exact expression they had worn at different passages of their conversation, and recognized in every line and lineament the Giants of the night was no vision, but that he had heard and seen with his own proper senses, he walked forth, determining at all hazards to conceal himself in the Guildhall again that evening further resolved to sleep all day, so that he might be very wakeful and vigilant, and above all that he might take notice of the figures at the precise moment of their becoming animated and subsiding into their old state, which he greatly reproached himself for not having done already

"SIR,—Before you proceed any further in your account of your friends and what you say and do when you meet together, excuse me if I proffer my claim to be elected to one of the vacant chairs in that old room of yours Don't reject me without full consideration, for if you do, you will be sorry for it afterwards—you will, upon my life.

"I enclose my card, sir, in this letter I never was ashamed of my name, and I never shall be I am considered a devilish gentlemanly fellow, and I act up to the character If you want a reference, ask any of the men at our club Ask any fellow who goes there to write his letters, what sort of conversation mine is Ask him if he thinks I have the sort of voice that will suit your deaf friend and make him hear, if he can hear anything at all Ask the servants what they think of me There's not a rascal among 'em, sir, but will tremble to hear my name That reminds me—don't you say too much about that housekeeper of yours, it's a low subject, damned low

"I tell you what, sir If you vote me into one of those empty chairs, you'll have among you a man with a fund of gentlemanly information that'll rather astonish you I can let you into a few anecdotes about some fine women of title, that are quite high life, sir—the tiptop sort of thing I know the name of every man who has been out on an affair of honour within the last five-and-twenty years, I know the private particulars of every cross and squabble that has taken place upon the turf, at the gaming-table, or elsewhere, during the whole of that time I have been called the gentlemanly chronicle You may consider yourself a lucky dog, upon my soul, you may congratulate yourself, though I say so

"It's an uncommon good notion that of yours, not letting anybody know where you live "I have tried it, but there has always been an anxiety respecting me, which has found me out Your deaf friend is a cunning fellow to keep his name so close I have tried that too, but have always failed I shall be proud to make his acquaintance—tell him so, with my compliments

"You must have been a queer fellow when you were a child, confounded queer It's odd, all that about the picture in your first paper—prosy, but told in a devilish gentlemanly sort of way In places like that I could come in with great effect with a touch of life—don't you feel that?

'I am anxiously waiting for your next paper to know whether your friends live upon the premises, and at your expense, which I take it for granted is the case If I am right in this impression, I know a charming fellow (an excellent companion and most delightful company) who will be proud to join you Some years ago he seconded a great many prize-fighters, and once fought an amateur match himself, since then he has driven several mails, broken at different periods all the lamps on the right-hand side of Oxford Street, and six times carried away every bell-handle in Bloomsbury Square, besides turning off the gas in various thoroughfares. In point of gentlemanliness, he is unrivalled, and I should say that next to myself he is of all men the best suited to your purpose. "Expecting your reply,

"I am,

Master Humphrey informs this gentleman that his application, both as it concerns himself and his friend, is rejected

My old companion tells me it is midnight. The fire glows brightly, crackling with a sharp and cheerful sound, as if it loved to burn. The merry cricket on the hearth (my constant visitor), this ruddy blaze, my clock, and I, seem to share the world among us, and to be the only things awake. The wind, high and boisterous but now, has died away and hoarsely mutters in its sleep. I love all times and seasons each in its turn, and am apt, perhaps, to think the present one the best, but past or coming I always love this peaceful time of night, when long-buried thoughts, favoured by the gloom and silence steal from their graves, and haunt the scenes of faded happiness and hope.

with the whole current of our thoughts at such an hour as this, and seems to be their necessary and natural consequence For who can wonder that man should feel a vague belief in tales of disembodied spirits wandering through those places which they once dearly affected, when he himself, scarcely less separated from his old world than they, is for ever lingering upon past emotions and bygone times, and hovering, the ghost of his former self, about the places and people that warmed his heart of old? It is thus that at this quiet hour I haunt the house where I was born, the rooms I used to tread, the scenes of my infancy, my boyhood, and my youth, it is thus that I prowl around my buried treasure (though not of gold or silver), and mourn my loss, it is thus that I revisit the ashes of extinguished fires, and take my silent stand at old bedsides If my spirit should ever glide back to this chamber when my body is mingled with the dust, it will but follow the course it often took in the old man's life. time, and add but one more change to the subjects of its contemplation

In all my idle speculations I am greatly assisted by various legends connected with my venerable house, which are current in the neighbourhood, and are so numerous that there is scarce a cupboard or corner that has not some dismal story of its own. When I first entertained thoughts of becoming its tenant, I was assured that it was haunted from roof to cellar, and I believe that the bad opinion in which my neighbours once held me, had its rise in my not being torn to pieces, or at least distracted with terror, on the night I took possession, in either of which cases I should doubtless have arrived by a short cut at the very summit of popularity

But traditions and rumours all taken into account, who so abets me in every fancy and chimes with my every thought, as my dear deaf friend? and how often have I cause to bless the day that brought us two together? Of all days in the year I rejoice to think that it should have been Christmas Day, with which from childhood we associate something friendly, hearty, and sincere others, and, in the little tokens of festivity and rejoicing, of which the streets and houses present so many upon that day, had lost some hours. Now I stopped to look at a merry party hurrying through the snow on foot to their place of meeting, and now turned back to see a whole coachful of children safely deposited at the welcome house. At one time, I admired how carefully the working man carried the baby in its gaudy hat and feathers, and how his wife, trudging patiently on behind, forgot even her care of her gay clothes, in exchanging greetings with the child as it crowed and laughed over the father's shoulder, at another, I pleased myself with some passing scene of gallantry or courtship, and was glad to believe that for a season half the world of poverty was gay

As the day closed in, I still rambled through the streets, feeling a companionship in the bright fires that cast their warm reflection on the windows as I passed, and losing all sense of my own loneliness in imagining the occality and kind-fellowship that everywhere prevailed At length I happened to stop before a Tavern, and, encountering a Bill of Fare in the window, it all at once prought it into my head to wonder what kind of people

dined alone in Taverns upon Christmas Day

Solitary men are accustomed, I suppose, unconsciously to look upon solitude as their own peculiar property I had sat alone in my room on many, many anniversaries of this great holiday, and had never regarded it but as one of universal assemblage and rejoicing I had excepted, and with an aching heart, a crowd of prisoners and beggars, but these were not the men for whom the Tavern doors were open Had they any customers, or was it a mere form?—a form, no doubt

Trying to feel quite sure of this I walked away, but before I had gone many paces, I stopped and looked back. There was a provoking air of business in the lamp above the door which I could not overcome. I began to be afraid there might be many customers—young men, perhaps, struggling with the world, utter strangers in this great place, whose friends lived at a long distance off, and whose means were too slender to enable them to make the journey. The supposition gave rise to so many distressing little pictures, that, in preference to carrying them home with me, I determined to encounter the realities So I turned and walked in

I was at once glad and sorry to find that there was only ore person in the dining room, glad to know that there were not more, and sorry that he should be there by himself. He did not look so old as I, but like me he was advanced in life, and his hair was nearly white. Though I made more noise in entering and seating myself than was quite necessary, with the view of attracting his attention and saluting him in the good old form of that time of year, he did not raise his head, but sat with it resting on his hand, musing over his half-finished meal

I called for something which would give me an excuse for remaining in the room (I had dined early, as my house-keeper was engaged at night to partake of some friend's good cheer), and sat where I could observe without intruding on him. After a time he looked up. He was aware that somebody had entered, but could see very little of me, as I sat in the shade and he in the light. He was sad and thoughtful, and I forbore to trouble him by speaking

Let me believe it was something better than curiosity which riveted my attention and impelled me strongly towards this gentleman. I never saw so patient and kind a face. He should have been surrounded by friends, and yet here he sat dejected and alone when all men had their friends about them. As often as he roused himself from his reverie he would fall into it again, and it was plain that, whatever were the subjects of his thoughts, they were of a melancholy kind, and would not be controlled.

He was not used to solitude I was sure of that, for I know by myself that if he had been, his manner would have been different, and he would have taken some slight interest in the arrival of affother. I could not fail to mark that he had no appetite, that he tried to eat in vain, that time after time the plate was pushed away, and he relapsed into his former posture

His mind was wandering among old Christmas days, I thought Many of them sprung up together, not with a long gap between each, but in unbroken succession like days of the week It was a great change to find himself for the first time (I quite settled that it was the first) in an empty, silent room with no soul to care for I could not help following him in imagination through crowds of pleasant faces, and then coming back to that dull place with its bough of mistletoe sickening in the gas, and sprigs of holly parched up already by a Simoom of roast and boiled. The very waiter had gone home, and his representative, a poor, lean, hungry man was keeping Christmas in his jacket.

I grew still more interested in my friend His dinner done, a decanter of wine was placed before him. It remained untouched for a long time, but at length with a quivering hand he filled a glass and raised it to his lips. Some tender wish to which he had been accustomed to give utterance on that day, or some beloved name that he had been used to pledge trembled upon them at the moment. He put it down very hastily—took it up once more—again put it down—pressed his hand upon his face—yes—and tears stole down his cheeks, I am certain

him laid my hand gently on his arm

"My friend," I said, "forgive me if I beseech you to take comfort and consolation from the lips of an old man I will not preach to you what I have not practised, indeed Whatever be your grief, be of a good heart—be of a good heart, pray!"

"I see that you speak earnestly," he replied, "and kindly

I am very sure, but——"

I nodded my head to show that I understood what he would say, for I had already gathered, from a certain fixed expression in his face, and from the attention with which he watched me while I spoke, that his sense of hearing was destroyed "There should be freemasonry between us," said I, pointing from himself to me to explain my meaning, if not in our grey hairs, at least in our misfortunes You see that I am but a poor cripple

I never felt so happy under my affliction since the trying moment of my first becoming conscious of it, as when he took my hand in his with a smile that nas highted my path in life from that day, and we sat down side by side

This was the beginning of my friendship with the deaf gentleman, and when was ever the slight and easy service of a kind word in season repaid by such attachment and devotion as he has shown to me!

He produced a little set of tablets and a pencil to facilitate our conversation, on that our first acquaintance, and I well remember how awkward and constrained I was in writing down my share of the dialogue, and how easily he guessed my meaning before I had written half of what I had to say He told me in a faltering voice that he had not been accustomed to be alone on that day—that it had always been a little festival with him, and seeing that I glanced at his dress in the expectation that he wore mourning, he added hastily that it was not that, if it had been he thought he could have borne it better From that time to the present we have never touched upon this theme. Upon every return of the same day we have been together, and although we make it our annual custom to drink to each other hand in hand after dinner, and to recall with affectionate garrulity every circumstance of our first meeting, we always avoid this one as if by mutual consent

Meantime we have gone on strengthening in our friend-ship and regard, and forming an attachment which, I trust and believe, will only be interrupted by death, to be renewed in another existence. I scarcely know how we communicate as we do, but he has long since ceased to be deaf to me. He is frequently my companion in my walks, and even in crowded streets replies to my slightest look or gesture, as though he could read my thoughts. From the vast number of objects which pass in rapid succession before our eyes, we frequently select the same for some particular notice or remark, and when one of these little coincidences occurs, I cannot describe the pleasure which animates my friend, or the beaming countenance he will preserve for half-anhour afterwards at least

and enlarging upon odd ideas, which renders nim invaluable to our little body, and greatly astonishes our two friends His powers in this respect are much assisted by a large pipe, which he assures us once belonged to a German Stu-Be this as it may, it has undoubtedly a very ancient and mysterious appearance, and is of such capacity that it takes three hours and a half to smoke it out I have reason to believe that my barber, who is the chief authority of a knot of gossips, who congregate every evening at a small tobacconist's hard by, has related anecdotes of this pipe and the grim figures that are carved upon its bowl, at which all the smokers in the neighbourhood have stood aghast. and I know that my housekeeper, while she holds it in high veneration, has a superstitious feeling connected with it which would render her exceedingly unwilling to be left alone in its company after dark

Whatever sorrow my dear friend has known, and whatever grief may linger in some secret corner of his heart, he is now a cheerful, placid, happy creature Misfortune can never have fallen upon such a man but for some good purpose, and when I see its traces in his gentle nature and his earnest feeling, I am the less disposed to murmur at such trials as I may have undergone myself With regard to the pipe, I have a theory of my own, I cannot help thinking that it is in some manner connected with the event that brought us together, for I remember that it was a long time before he even talked about it, that when he did, he grew reserved and melancholy, and that it was a long time yet before he brought it forth I have no curiosity, however, upon this subject, for I know that it promotes his tranquility and comfort, and I need no other inducement to regard it with my utmost favour

Such is the deaf gentleman. I can call up his figure now, clad in sober grey, and seated in the chimney-corner As he puffs out the smoke from his favourite pipe, he casts a look on me brimful of cordiality and friendship, and says all manner of kind and genial things in a cheerful smile, then he raises his eyes to my clock, which is just about to strike, and, glancing from it to me and back again, seems to divide his heart between us. For myself, it is not too

Of our two friends, the first has been all his life one of that easy, wayward, truant class whom the world is accustomed to designate as nobody's enemies but their own Bred to a profession for which he never qualified himself. and reared in the expectation of a fortune he has never inherited, he has undergone every vicissitude of which such an existence is capable He and his younger brother, both orphans from their childhood, were educated by a wealthy relative, who taught them to expect an equal division of his property, but too indolent to court, and too honest to flatter, the elder gradually lost ground in the affections of a capricious old man, and the younger, who did not fail to improve his opportunity, now triumphs in the possession of enormous wealth triumph is to hoard it in solitary wretchedness, and probably to feel with the expenditure of every shilling a greater pang than the loss of his whole inheritance ever cost his brother

Tack Redburn—he was Tack Redburn at the first little school he went to, where every other child was mastered and surnamed, and he has been Jack Redburn all his life, or he would perhaps have been a richer man by this time -has been an inmate of my house these eight years past He is my librarian, secretary, steward, and first minister. director of all my affairs, and inspector-general of my household He is something of a musician, something of an author, something of an actor, something of a painter, very much of a carpenter, and an extraordinary gardener, having had all his life a wonderful aptitude for learning everything that was of no use to him He is remarkably fond of children, and is the best and kindest nurse in sickness that ever drew the breath of life He has mixed with every grade of society, and known the utmost distress, but there never was a less selfish, a more tender-hearted, a more enthusiastic, or a more guileless man, and I dare say, if few have done less good, fewer still have done less harm in the world than he By what chance Nature forms such whimsical jumbles, I don't know, but I do know that she sends them among us very often, and that the

I should be puzzled to say how old he is His health is none of the best, and he wears a quantity of iron-grey hair, which shades his face and gives it rather a worn appearance, but we consider him quite a young fellow notwithstanding, and if a youthful spirit, surviving the roughest contact with the world, confers upon its possessor any title to be considered young, then he is a mere child The only interruptions to his careless cheerfulness are on a wet Sunday, when he is apt to be unusually religious and solemn, and sometimes of an evening, when he has been blowing a very slow tune on the flute On these last-named occasions he is apt to incline towards the mysterious or the terrible As a specimen of his powers in this mood, I refer my readers to the extract from the clock-case which follows this paper he brought it to me not long ago at midnight, and informed me that the main incident had been suggested by a dream of the night before

His apartments are two cheerful rooms looking towards the garden, and one of his great delights is to arrange and rearrange the furniture in these chambers, and put it in every possible variety of position. During the whole time he has been here, I do not think he has slept for two nights running with the head of his bed in the same place, and every time he moves it, is to be the last My housekeeper was at first well-nigh distracted by these frequent changes, but she has become quite reconciled to them by degrees, and has so fallen in with his humour, that they often consult together with great gravity upon the next final alteration Whatever his arrangements are, however, they are always a pattern of neatness, and every one of the manifold articles connected with his manifold occupations is to be found in its own particular place within the last two or three years he was subject to an occasional fit (which usually came upon him in very fine weather), under the influence of which he would dress nimself with peculiar care, and, going out under pretence of taking a walk, disappeared for several days together

At length, after the interval between each outbreak of this disorder had gradually grown longer and longer, it wholly disappeared, and now he seldom stirs abroad, except to stroll out a little way on a summer's evening Whether he yet mistrusts his own constancy in this respect, and is therefore afraid to wear a coat, I know not, but we seldom see him in any other upper garment than an old spectral-looking dressing-gown, with very disproportionate pockets, full of a miscellaneous collection of odd matters, which he picks up wherever he can lay his hands upon them

Everything that is a favourite with our friend is a favourite with us, and thus it happens that the fourth among us is Mr Owen Miles, a most worthy gentleman, who had treated Jack with great kindness before my deaf friend and I encountered him by an accident, to which I may refer on some future occasion Mr Miles was once a very rich merchant, but receiving a severe shock in the death of his wife, he retired from business, and devoted himself to a quiet, unostentatious life He is an excellent man, of thoroughly sterling character not of quick apprehension, and not without some amusing prejudices, which I shall leave to their own development He holds us all in profound veneration, but Jack Redburn he esteems as a kind of pleasant wonder, that he may venture to approach familiarly He believes, not only that no man ever lived who could do so many things as Jack, but that no man ever lived who could do anything so well; and he never calls my attention to any of his ingenious proceedings, but he whispers in my ear, nudging me at the same time with his elbow. "If he had only made it his trade, sir-if he had only made it his trade!"

They are inseparable companions, one would almost suppose that, although Mr Miles never by any chance does anything in the way of assistance, Jack could do nothing without him Whether he is reading, writing, painting, carpentering, gardening, flute-playing, or what not, there is Mr Miles beside him, buttoned up to the chin in his blue coat, and looking on with a face of incredulous delight, as though he could not credit the testimony of his own senses, and had a misgiving that no man could be so clever but in a dream

A CONFESSION FOUND IN A PRISON IN THE TIME OF CHARLES THE SECOND

I held a lieutenant's commission in his Majesty's army, and served abroad in the campaigns of 1677 and 1678. The treaty of Nimeguen being concluded, I returned home, and retiring from the service, withdrew to a small estate lying a few miles east of London, which I had recently acquired in right of my wife

This is the last night I have to live, and I will set down the naked truth without disguise I was never a brave man, and had always been from my childhood of a secret, sullen, distrustful nature I speak of myself as if I had passed from the world, for while I write this, my grave is digging, and my name is written in the black-book of death

Soon after my return to England, my only brother was seized with mortal illness. This circumstance gave me slight or no pain, for since we had been men, we had associated but very little together. He was open-hearted and generous, handsomer than I, more accomplished, and generally beloved. Those who sought my acquaintance abroad or at home, because they were friends of his, seldom attached themselves to me long, and would usually say, in our first conversation, that they were surprised to find two brothers so unlike in their manners and appearance. It was my habit to lead them on to this avowal, for I knew what comparisons they must draw between us, and having a rankling envy in my heart, I sought to justify it to myself

We had married two sisters This additional tie between us, as it may appear to some, only estranged us the more His wife knew me well I never struggled with any secret jealousy or gall when she was present but that woman knew it as well as I did I never raised my eyes at such times but I found hers fixed upon me, I never bent them on the ground or looked another way but I felt that she overlooked me always It was an inexpressible relief to me when we quarrelled, and a greater relief still when I heard abroad that she was dead It seems to me now as if some strange and terrible foreshadowing of what has happened since must have hung over us then I was afraid of her, she haunted me, her fixed and steady look comes back upon me now, like the memory of a dark dream, and makes my blood run cold

She died shortly after giving birth to a child—a boy When my brother knew that all hope of his own recovery was past, he called my wife to his bedside, and confided this orphan, a child of four years old, to her protection He bequeathed to him all the property he had, and willed that, in case of his child's death, it should pass to my wife, as the only acknowledgment he could make her for her care and love He exchanged a few brotherly words with me, deploring our long separation, and being exhausted, fell into a slumber, from which he never awoke

We had no children, and as there had been a strong affection between the sisters, and my wife had almost supplied the place of a mother to this boy, she loved him as if he had been her own. The child was ardently attached to her, but he was his mother's image in face and spirit, and always mistrusted me

I can scarcely fix the date when the feeling first came upon me, but I soon began to be uneasy when this child was by I never roused myself from some moody train of thought but I marked him looking at me, not with mere childish wonder, but with something of the purpose and meaning that I had so often noted in his mother. It was no effort of my fancy, founded on close resemblance of feature and expression. I never could look the boy down He feared me, but seemed by some instinct to despise me while he did so, and even when he drew back beneath my gaze—as he would when we were alone, to get nearer to the door—he would keep his bright eyes upon me still

Perhaps I hide the truth from myself, but I do not think that, when this began, I meditated to do him any wrong

I may have thought how serviceable his inheritance would be to us, and may have wished him dead, but I believe I had no thought of compassing his death. Neither did the idea come upon me at once, but by very slow degrees, presenting itself at first in dim shapes at a very great distance, as men may think of an earthquake or the last day, then drawing nearer and nearer, and losing something of its horror and improbability, then coming to be part and parcel—nay nearly the whole sum and substance—of my daily thoughts, and resolving itself into a question of means and safety, not of doing or abstaining from the deed

While this was going on within me, I never could bear that the child should see me looking at him, and yet I was under a fascination which made it a kind of business with me to contemplate his slight and fragile figure and think how easily it might be done. Sometimes I would steal upstairs and watch him as he slept, but usually I hovered in the garden near the window of the room in which he learnt his little tasks, and there, as he sat upon a low seat beside my wife, I would peer at him for hours together from behind a tree, starting, like the guilty wretch I was, at every rustling of a leaf, and still gliding back to look and start again

Hard by our cottage, but quite out of sight, and (if there were any wind astir) of hearing too, was a deep sheet of I spent days in shaping with my pocket-knife a rough model of a boat, which I finished at last and dropped in the child's way 'Then I withdrew to a secret place, which he must pass if he stole away alone to swim this bauble, and lurked there for his coming He came neither that day nor the next, though I waited from noon till nightfall I was sure that I had him in my net, for I had heard him prattling of the toy, and knew that in his infant pleasure he kept it by his side in bed I felt no weariness or fatigue, but waited patiently, and on the third day he passed me, running joyously along, with his silken hair streaming in the wind, and he singing-God have mercy upon me!-singing a merry ballad,-who could hardly usp the words

which grow in that place, and none but devils know with what terror I, a strong, full-grown man, tracked the footsteps of that baby as he approached the water's brink was close upon him, had sunk upon my knee and raised my hand to thrust him in, when he saw my shadow in the stream and turned him round

His mother's ghost was looking from his eyes The sun burst forth from behind a cloud, it shone in the bright sky, the glistening earth, the clear water, the sparkling drops of rain upon the leaves There were eyes in everything The whole great universe of light was there to see the murder done I know not what he said, he came of bold and manly blood, and, child as he was, he did not crouch or fawn upon me I heard him cry that he would try to love me,-not that he did,-and then I saw him running back The next I saw was my own sword towards the house naked in my hand, and he lying at my feet stark dead,dabbled here and there with blood, but otherwise no different from what I had seen him in his sleep,-in the same attitude too, with his cheek resting upon his little hand

I took him in my arms and laid him-very gently now that he was dead-in a thicket My wife was from home that day, and would not return until the next Our bedroom window, the only sleeping-room on that side of the house, was but a few feet from the ground, and I resolved to descend from it at night and bury him in the garden had no thought that I had failed in my design, no thought that the water would be dragged and nothing found, that the money must now lie waste, since I must encourage the idea that the child was lost or stolen All my thoughts were bound up and knotted together in the one absorbing necessity of hiding what I had done

How I felt when they came to tell me that the child was missing, when I ordered scouts in all directions, when I gasped and trembled at every one's approach, no tongue can tell or mind of man conceive I buried him that night When I parted the boughs and looked into the dark thicket, there was a glow-worm shining like the visible spirit of God upon the murdered child I glanced down into his grave when I had placed him there, and still it gleamed upon his breast, an eye of fire looking up to Heaven in supplication to the stars that watched me at my work

I had to meet my wife, and break the news, and give her hope that the child would soon be found. All this I did,—with some appearance, I suppose, of being sincere, for I was the object of no suspicion. This done, I sat at the bedroom window all day long, and watched the spot where the dreadful secret lay.

It was in a piece of ground which had been dug up to be newly turfed, and which I had chosen on that account, as the traces of my spade were less likely to attract attention. The men who laid down the grass must have thought me mad. I called to them continually to expedite their work, ran out and worked beside them, trod down the earth with my feet, and hurried them with frantic eagerness. They had finished their task before night, and then I thought myself comparatively safe.

I slept,—not as men do who awake refreshed and cheerful, but I did sleep, passing from vague and shadowy dreams of being hunted down, to visions of the plot of grass, through which now a hand, and now a foot, and now the head itself was starting out. At this point I always woke and stole to the window, to make sure that it was not really so. That done, I crept to bed again, and thus I spent the night in fits and starts, getting up and lying down full twenty times, and dreaming the same dream over and over again,—which was far worse than lying awake, for every dream had a whole night's suffering of its own Once I thought the child was alive, and that I had never tried to kill him. To wake from that dream was the most dreadful agony of all

The next day I sat at the window again, never once taking my eyes from the place, which, although it was covered by the grass, was as plain to me—its shape, its size, its depth, its jagged sides, and all—as if it had been open to the light of day. When a servant walked across it, I felt as if he must sink in, when he had passed, I looked to see that his feet had not worn the edges. If a bird lighted there, I was in terror lest by some tremendous interposition it should be instrumental in the discovery; if a breath of air sighed across it, to me it whispered murder There was not a sight or a sound—how ordinary, mean, or unimportant soever—but was fraught with fear And in this state of ceaseless watching I spent three days

On the fourth there came to the gate one who had served with me abroad, accompanied by a brother officer of his whom I had never seen I felt that I could not bear to be out of sight of the place It was a summer evening, and I bade my people take a table and a flask of wine into the garden Then I sat down with my chair upon the grave, and being assured that nobody could disturb it now without my knowledge, tried to drink and talk

They hoped that my wife was well,—that she was not obliged to keep her chamber,—that they had not frightened her away What could I do but tell them with a faltering tongue about the child? The officer whom I did not know was a down-looking man, and kept his eyes upon the ground while I was speaking Even that terrified me I could not divest myself of the idea that he saw something there which caused him to suspect the truth I asked him hurriedly if he supposed that—and stopped "That the child has been murdered?" said he, looking mildly at me "O no! what could a man gain by murdering a poor child?" I could have told him what a man gained by such a deed, no one better but I held my peace and shivered as with an ague

Mistaking my emotion, they were endeavouring to cheer me with the hope that the boy would certainly be found,—great cheer that was for me!—when we heard a low deep howl, and presently there sprung over the wall two great dogs, who, bounding into the garden, repeated the baying sound we had heard before

"Bloodhounds!" cried my visitors

What need to tell me that! I had never seen one of that kind in all my life, but I knew what they were and for what purpose they had come I grasped the elbows of my chair, and neither spoke nor moved

"They are of the genuine breed," said the man whom I had known abroad, "and being out for exercise have no

Both he and his friend turned to look at the dogs, who with their noses to the ground moved restlessly about, running to and fro, and up and down, and across, and round in circles, careering about like wild things, and all this time taking no notice of us, but ever and again repeating the yell we had heard already, then dropping their noses to the ground again and tracking earnestly here and there. They now began to snuff the earth more eagerly than they had done yet, and although they were still very restless, no longer beat about in such wide circuits, but kept near to one spot, and constantly diminished the distance between themselves and me

At last they came up close to the great chair on which I sat, and raising their frightful howl once more, tried to tear away the wooden rails that kept them from the ground beneath I saw how I looked, in the faces of the two who were with me

"They scent some prey," said they, both together

"They scent no prey!" cried I

"In Heaven's name, move!" said the one I knew, very earnestly, "or you will be torn to pieces"

"Let them tear me from limb to limb, I'll never leave this place!" cried I "Are dogs to hurry men to shameful deaths? Hew them down, cut them in pieces"

"There is some foul mystery here!" said the officer whom I did not know, drawing his sword "In King Charles's name, assist merto secure this man"

They both set upon me and forced me away, though I fought and bit and caught at them like a madman After a struggle, they got me quietly between them, and then, my God! I saw the angry dogs tearing at the earth and throwing it up into the air like water

What more have I to tell? That I fell upon my knees, and with chattering teeth confessed the truth, and prayed to be forgiven. That I have since denied, and now confess to it again. That I have been tried for the crime, found guilty, and sentenced. That I have not the courage to anticipate my doom, or to bear up manfully against it. That I have no compassion, no consolation, no hope, no friend. That my wife has happily lost for the time those faculties which would enable her to know my misery of hers. That I am alone in this stone dungeon with my evil spirit, and that I die to-morrow*

Master Humphrey has been favoured with the following letter written on strongly-scented paper, and sealed in light-blue wax with the representation of two very plump doves interchanging beaks. It does not commence with any of the usual forms of address, but begins as is here set forth.

BATH, Wednesday night.

Heavens! into what an indiscretion do I suffer myself to be betrayed! To address these faltering lines to a total stranger, and that stranger one of a conflicting sex!—and yet I am precipitated into the abyss, and have no power of self-snatchation (forgive me if I coin that phrase) from the yawning gulf before me

Yes, I am writing to a man, but let me not think of that, for madness is in the thought. You will understand my feelings? O yes, I am sure you will, and you will respect them too, and not despise them,—will you?

Let me be calm That portrait,—smiling as once he smiled on me, that cane,—dangling as I have seen it dangle from his hand I know not how oft, those legs that have glided through my nightly dreams and never stopped to speak, the perfectly gentlemanly, though false original,—can I be mistaken? O no no

—can I be mistaken? O no, no

Let me be calmer yet, I would be calm as coffins You have published a letter from one whose likeness is engraved, but whose name (and wherefore?) is suppressed Shall I breathe that name! Is it—but why ask when my heart tells me too truly that it is!

I would not upbraid him with his treachery, I would not remind him of those times when he plighted the most eloquent of vows, and procured from me a small pecuniary accommodation, and yet I would see him—see him did I say—him—alas! such is woman's nature. For as the poet beautifully says—but you will already have anticipated the sentiment. Is it not sweet? O yes!

sentiment Is it not sweet? O yes!

It was in this city (hallowed by the recollection) that I met him first, and assuredly if mortal happiness be recorded anywhere, then those rubbers with their three-and-sixpenny points are scored on tablets of celestial brass. He always held an honour—generally two. On that eventful night we stood at eight. He raised his eyes (luminous in their seductive sweetness) to my agitated face. "Can you!" said he, with peculiar meaning. I felt the gentle pressure his foot on mine, our corns throbbed in unison. "Can you?" he said again, and every lineament of his expressive countenance added the words "resist me?" I murmured "No," and fainted

They said, when I recovered, it was the weather I said it was the nutmeg in the negus. How little did they suspect the truth! How little did they guess the deep mysterious meaning of that inquiry! He called next morning on his knees, I do not mean to say that he actually came in that position to the house-door, but that he went down upon those joints directly the servant had retired. He brought some verses in his hat, which he said were original, but which I have since found were Milton's, likewise a little bottle labelled laudanum, also a pistol and a swordstick. He drew the latter, uncorked the former, and clicked the trigger of the pocket fire-arm. He had come, he said, to conquer or to die. He did not die. He wrested from me an avowal of my love, and let off the pistol out of a back window previous to partaking of a slight repast.

Faithless, inconstant man! How many ages seem to have elapsed since his unaccountable and perfidious disappearance! Could I still forgive him both that and the borrowed lucre that he promised to pay next week! Could I spurn him from my feet if he approached in penitence, and with a matrimonial object! Would the blandishing enchanter still weave his spells around me, or should I burst them all and turn away in coldness! I dare not trust

my weakness with the thought

My brain is in a whirl again You know his address, his occupations, his mode of life,—are acquainted, perhaps, with his inmost thoughts You are a humane and philanthronic character, reveal all you know—all, but especially the street and number of his lodgings The post is departing, the bellman rings,—pray Heaven it be not the knell of love and hope to BELINDA

- PS Pardon the wanderings of a bad pen and a distracted mind Address to the Post-office The bellman. rendered impatient by delay, is ringing dreadfully in the passage
- I open this to say that the bellman is gone, and that you must not expect it till the next post, so don't be surprised when you don't get it

Master Humphrey does not feel himself at liberty to furnish his fair correspondent with the address of the gentleman in question, but he publishes her letter as a public appeal to his faith and gallantry

MASTER HUMPHREY'S VISITOR

WHEN I am in a thoughtful mood, I often succeed in diverting the current of some mournful reflections, by conjuring up a number of fanciful associations with the objects that surround me, and dwelling upon the scenes and characters they suggest

I have been led by this habit to assign to every room in my house and every old staring portrait on its walls a separate interest of its own Thus, I am persuaded that a stately dame, terrible to behold in her rigid modesty, who hangs above the chimney-piece of my bedroom, is the former lady of the mansion In the courtyard below is a stone face of surpassing ugliness, which I have somehowin a kind of realousy, I am afraid-associated with her husband Above my study is a little room with ivy peeping through the lattice, from which I bring their daughter, a lovely girl of eighteen or nineteen years of age, and dutiful in all respects save one, that one being her devoted attachment to a young gentleman on the stairs, whose grandmother (degraded to a disused laundry in the garden) piques herself upon an old family quarrel, and is the implacable enemy of their love With such materials as these I work out many a little drama, whose chief merit is, that I can bring it to a happy end at will I have so many of them on hand, that if on my return home one of these evenings, I were to find some bluff old wight of two centuries ago comfortably seated in my easy chair, and a lovelorn damsel vainly appealing to his heart, and leaning her white arm upon my clock itself, I verily believe I should only express my surprise that they had kept me waiting so long, and never honoured me with a call before

I was in such a mood as this, sitting in my garden yesterday morning under the shade of a favourite tree, revelling in all the bloom and brightness about me, and feeling every sense of hope and enjoyment quickened by this most beautiful season of Spring, when my meditations were interrupted by the unexpected appearance of my barber at the end of the walk, who I immediately saw was coming towards me with a hasty step that betokened something

My barber is at all times a very brisk, bustling, active little man,—for he'is, as it were, chubby all over, without being stout or unwieldy,—but yesterday his alacrity was so very uncommon that it quite took me by surprise. For could I fail to observe when he came up to me that his grey eyes were twinkling in a most extraordinary manner, that his little red nose was in an unusual glow, that every line in his round bright face was twisted and curved into an expression of pleased surprise, and that his whole countenance was radiant with glee? I was still more surprised to see my housekeeper, who usually preserves a very staid air, and stands somewhat upon her dignity, peeping round the hedge at the bottom of the walk, and exchanging nods and smiles with the barber, who twice or thrice looked over his shoulder for that purpose I could conceive no announcement to which these appearances could be the prelude, unless it were that they had married each other that morning

I was, consequently, a little disappointed when it only came out that there was a gentleman in the house who wished to speak with me

"And who is it?" said I

The barber, with his face screwed up still tighter than before, replied that the gentleman would not send his name, but wished to see me I pondered for a moment, wondering who this visitor might be, and I remarked that he embraced the opportunity of exchanging another nod with the housekeeper, who still lingered in the distance

"Well " said I, "bid the gentleman come here"

This seemed to be the consummation of the barber's hopes, for he turned sharp round, and actually ran away

Now, my sight is not very good at a distance, and therefore when the gentleman first appeared in the walk, I was not quite clear whether he was a stranger to me or otherwise. He was an elderly gentleman, but came tripping along in the pleasantest manner conceivable, avoiding the garden-roller and the borders of the beds with inimitable dexterity, picking his way among the flower-pots, and smiling with unspeakable good humour. Before he was halfway up the walk he began to salute me, then I thought I knew him, but when he came towards me with his hat in his hand, the sun shining on his bald flead, his bland face, his bright spectacles, his fawn-coloured tights, and his black gaiters,—then my heart warmed towards him, and I felt quite certain that it was Mr Pickwick

"My dear sir," said that gentleman as I rose to receive him, "pray be seated • Pray sit down Now, do not stand on my account I must insist upon it, really "With these words Mr Pickwick gently pressed me down into my seat, and taking my hand in his, shook it again and again with a warmth of manner perfectly irresistible. I endeavoured to express in my welcome something of that heartiness and pleasure which the sight of him awakened, and made him sit down beside me. All this time he kept alternately releasing my hand and grasping it again, and surveying me through his spectacles with such a beaming countenance as I never till then beheld

"You knew me directly!" said Mr Pickwick "What a pleasure it is to think that you knew me directly!"

I remarked that I had read his adventures very often, and his features were quite familiar to me from the published portraits. As I thought it a good opportunity of adverting to the circumstance, I condoled with him upon the various libels on his character which had found their way into print. Mr. Pickwick shook his head, and for a moment looked very indignant, but smiling again directly, added that no doubt I was acquainted with Cervantes's introduction to the second part of Don Quixote, and that it fully expressed his sentiments on the subject

"But now," said Mr Pickwick, "don't you wonder how

I found you out?"

"I shall never wonder, and, with your good leave, never know," said I, smiling in my turn "It is enough for me that you give me this gratification I have not the least desire that you should tell me by what means I have obtained it"

"You are very kind," returned Mr Pickwick, shaking me by the hand again, "you are so exactly what I expected! But for what particular purpose do you think I sought you, my good sir? Now what do you think I have come for?"

Mr Pickwick put this question as though he were persuaded that it was morally impossible that I could by any means divine the deep purpose of his visit, and that it must be hidden from all human ken. Therefore, although I was rejoiced to think that I had anticipated his drift, I feigned to be quite ignorant of it, and after a brief consideration shook my head despairingly

"What should you say," said Mr Pickwick, laying the forefinger of his left hand upon my coat-sleeve, and looking at me with his head thrown back, and a little on one side,—"what should you say if I confessed that after reading your account of yourself and your little society, I had come here a humble candidate for one of those empty chairs?"

'I should say," I returned, "that I know of only one circumstance which could still further endear that little society to me, and that would be the associating with it my old friend,—for you must let me call you so,—my old friend, Mr Pickwick"

As I made him this answer every feature of Mr Pickwick's face fused itself into one all-pervading expression of delight. After shaking me heartily by both hands at once, he patted me gently on the back, and then—I well understood why—coloured up to the eyes, and hoped with great earnestness of manner that he had not hurt me

If he had, I would have been content that he should have repeated the offence a hundred times rather than suppose so, but as he had not, I had no difficulty in changing the subject by making an inquiry which had been upon my lips twenty times already

"You have not told me," said I, "anything about Sam

"O! Sam," replied Mr Pickwick, "is the same as ever The same true, faithful fellow that he ever was What should I tell you about Sam, my dear sir, except that he is more indispensable to my happiness and comfort every day of my life?"

"And Mr Weller senior?" said I

"Old Mr Weller," returned Mr Pickwick, "is in no respect more altered than Sam, unless it be that he is a little more opinionated than he was formerly, and perhaps at times more talkative. He spends a good deal of his time now in our neighbourhood, and has so constituted himself a part of my bodyguard, that when I ask permission for Sam to have a seat in your kitchen on clock nights (supposing your three friends think me worthy to fill one of the chairs), I am afraid I must often include Mr. Weller too."

I very readily pledged myself to give both Sam and his father a free admission to my house at all hours and seasons, and this point settled, we fell into a lengthy conversation which was carried on with as little reserve on both sides as if we had been intimate friends from our youth, and which conveyed to me the comfortable assurance that Mr Pickwick's buoyancy of spirit, and indeed all his old cheerful characteristics, were wholly unimpaired. As he had spoken of the consent of my friends as being yet in abeyance, I repeatedly assured him that his proposal was certain to receive their most joyful sanction, and several times entreated that he would give me leave to introduce him to Jack Redburn and Mr Miles (who were near at hand) without further ceremony

To this proposal, however, Mr Pickwick's delicacy would by no means allow him to accede, for he urged that his eligibility must be formally discussed, and that, until this had been done, he could not think of obtruding himself further. The utmost I could obtain from him was a promise that he would attend upon our next night of meeting, that I might have the pleasure of presenting him immediately on his election.

Mr Pickwick, having with many blushes placed in my hands a small roll of paper, which he termed his "qualification," put a great many questions to me touching my friends, and particularly Jack Redburn, whom he repeatedly termed "a fine fellow," and in whose favour I could see he was strongly predisposed When I had satisfied him on these points, I took him up into my room, that he might make acquaintance with the old chamber which is our place of meeting

"And this," said Mr Pickwick, stopping short, "is the clock! Dear me! And this is really the old clock!"

I thought he would never have come away from it After advancing towards it softly, and laying his hand upon it with as much respect and as many smiling looks as if it were alive, he set himself to consider it in every possible direction, now mounting on a chair to look at the top, now going down upon his knees to examine the bottom, now surveying the sides with his spectacles almost touch ing the case, and now trying to peep between it and the wall to get a slight view of the back. Then he would retire a pace or two and look up at the dial to see it go, and then draw near again and stand with his head on one side to hear it tick never failing to glance towards me at intervals of a few seconds each, and nod his head with such complacent gratification as I am quite unable to describe His admiration was not confined to the clock either, but extended itself to every article in the room, and really, when he had gone through them every one, and at last sat himself down in all the six chairs, one after another, to try how they felt, I never saw such a picture of good-humour and happiness as he presented, from the top of his shining head down to the very last button of his gaiters

I should have been well pleased, and should have had the utmost enjoyment of his company, if he had remained with me all day, but my favourite, striking the hour, reminded him that he must take his leave I could not forbear telling him once more how glad he had made me, and we shook hands all the way downstairs

We had no sooner arrived in the Hall than my house-keeper, gliding out of her little room (she had changed her gown and cap, I observed), greeted Mr Pickwick with her best smile and courtesy, and the barber, feigning to be accidentally passing on his way out, made him a vast number of bows. When the housekeeper courtesied, Mr Pickwick bowed with the utmost politeness, and when he bowed, the housekeeper courtesied again, between the housekeeper and the barber, I should say that Mr Pickwick faced about and bowed with undiminished affability fifty times at least

I saw him to the door, an omnibus was at the moment passing the corner of the lane, which Mr Pickwick hailed and ran after with extraordinary nimbleness. When he had got about half-way, he turned his head, and seeing that I was still looking after him and that I waved my hand, stopped, evidently irresolute whether to come back and shake hands again, or to go on. The man behind the omnibus shouted, and Mr Pickwick ran a little way towards him then he looked round at me, and ran a little way back again. Then there was another shout, and he turned round once more and ran the other way. After several of these vibrations, the man settled the question by taking Mr Pickwick by the arm and putting him into the carriage, but his last action was to let down the window and wave his hat to me as it drove off

I lost no time in opening the parcel he had left with me. The following were its contents —

MR PICKWICK S TALE

A good many years have passed away since old John Podgers lived in the town of Windsor, where he was born, and where, in course of time, he came to be comfortably and snugly buried. You may be sure that in the time of King James the First, Windsor was a very quaint queer old town, and you may take it upon my authority that John Podgers was a very quaint queer old fellow, consequently he and Windsor fitted each other to a nicety, and seldom

John Podgers was broad, sturdy, Dutch-built, short, and a very hard eater, as men of his figure often are hard sleeper likewise, he divided his time pretty equally between these two recreations, always falling asleep when he had done eating, and always taking another turn at the trencher when he had done sleeping, by which means he grew more corpulent and more drowsy every day of his life Indeed it used to be currently reported that when he sauntered up and down the sunny side of the street before dinner (as he never failed to do in fair weather), he enjoyed his soundest nap, but many people held this to be a fiction, as he had several times been seen to look after fat oxen on market-days, and had even been heard, by persons of good credit and reputation, to chuckle at the sight, and say to himself with great glee, "Live beef, live beef!" It was upon this evidence that the wisest people in Windsor (beginning with the local authorities of course) held that John Podgers was a man of strong, sound sense, not what is called smart, perhaps, and it might be of a rather lazy and apoplectic turn, but still a man of solid parts, and one who meant much more than he cared to show This impression was confirmed by a very dignified way he had of shaking his head and imparting, at the same time, a pendulous motion to his double chin, in short, he passed for one of those people who, being plunged into the Thames, would make no vain efforts to set it afire, but would straightway flop down to the bottom with a deal of gravity, and be highly respected in consequence by all good men.

Being well to do in the world, and a peaceful widower,—having a great appetite, which, as he could afford to gratify it, was a luxury and no inconvenience, and a power of going to sleep, which, as he had no occasion to keep awake, was a most enviable faculty,—you will readily suppose that John Podgers was a happy man But appearances are often deceptive when they least seem so, and the truth is that, notwithstanding his extreme sleekness, he was rendered uneasy in his mind and exceedingly uncomfortable by a constant apprehension that beset him night and day

You know very well that in those times there flourished divers evil old women who, under the name of Witches. spread great disorder through the land, and inflicted various dismal tortures upon Christian men, sticking pins and needles into them when they least expected it, and causing them to walk in the air with their feet upwards, to the great terror of their wives and families, who were naturally very much disconcerted when the master of the house unexpectedly came home, knocking at the door with his heels and combing his hair on the scraper These were their commonest pranks, but they every day played a hundred others, of which none were less objectionable, and many were much more so, being improper besides, the result was that vengeance was denounced against all old women, with whom even the king himself had no sympathy (as he certainly ought to have had), for with his own most Gracious hand he penned a most Gracious consignment of them to everlasting wrath, and devised most Gracious means for their confusion and slaughter, in virtue whereof scarcely a day passed but one witch at the least was most graciously hanged, drowned, or roasted in some part of his dominions Still the press teemed with strange and terrible news from the North or the South, or the East or the West, relative to witches and their unhappy victims in some corner of the country, and the Public's hair stood on end to that degree that it lifted its hat off its head, and made its face pale with terror

You may believe that the little town of Windsor did not escape the general contagion. The inhabitants boiled a witch on the king's birthday and sent a bottle of the broth to court, with a dutiful address expressive of their loyalty. The king, being rather frightened by the present, piously bestowed it upon the Archbishop of Canterbury, and returned an answer to the address, wherein he gave them golden rules for discovering witches, and laid great stress upon certain protecting charms, and especially horseshoes. Immediately the towns-people went to work nailing up horse-shoes over every door, and so many anxious parents apprenticed their children to farriers to keep them out of harm's way, that it became quite a genteel trade, and flourished exceedingly

In the midst of all this bustle John Podgers ate and slept as usual, but shook his head a great deal oftener than was his custom, and was observed to look at the oxen less, and at the old women more He had a little shelf put up in his sitting-room, whereon was displayed, in a row which grew longer every week, all the witchcraft literature of the time, he grew learned in charms and exorcisms, hinted at certain questionable females on broomsticks whom he had seen from his chamber window, riding in the air at night, and was in constant terror of being bewitched At length, from perpetually dwelling upon this one idea, which, being alone in his head, had all its own way, the fear of witches became the single passion of his life He, who up to that time had never known what it was to dream, began to have visions of witches whenever he fell asleep, waking, they were incessantly present to his imagination likewise, and, sleeping or waking, he had not a moment's peace He began to set witch-traps in the highway, and was often seen lying in wait round the corner for hours together, to watch their effect engines were of simple construction, usually consisting of two straws disposed in the form of a cross, or a piece of a Bible cover with a pinch of salt upon it, but they were infallible, and if an old woman chanced to stumble over them (as not unfrequently happened, the chosen spot being a broken and stony place), John started from a doze, pounced out upon her, and hung round her neck till assistance arrived, when she was immediately carried away and By dint of constantly inveighing old ladies and disposing of them in this summary manner, he acquired the reputation of a great public character, and as he received no harm in these pursuits beyond a scratched face or so, he came, in the course of time, to be considered witch-proof

There was but one person who entertained the least doubt of John Podgers's gifts, and that person was his own nephew, a wild, roving young fellow of twenty who had been brought up in his uncle's house and lived there still,—that is to say, when he was at home, which was not as often as it might have been. As he was an apt scholar, it was he who read aloud every fresh piece of strange and terrible intelligence that John Podgers bought, and this he always did of an evening in the little porch in front of the house, round which the neighbours would flock in crowds to hear the direful news,—for people like to be frightened, and when they can be frightened for nothing and at another man's expense, they like it all the better

One fine midsummer evening, a group of persons were gathered in this place, listening intently to Will Marks (that was the nephew's name), as with his cap very much on one side, his arm coiled slyly round the waist of a pretty girl who sat beside him, and his face screwed into a comical expression intended to represent extreme gravity, he read-with Heaven knows how many embellishments of his own—a dismal account of a gentleman down in Northamptonshire under the influence of witchcraft and taken forcible possession of by the Devil, who was playing his very self with him John Podgers, in a high sugar-loaf hat and short cloak, filled the opposite seat, and sur veyed the auditory with a look of mingled pride and horror very edifying to see, while the hearers, with their heads thrust forward and their mouths open, listened and trembled, and hoped there was a great deal more to come Sometimes Will stopped for an instant to look round upon his eager audience, and then, with a more comical expression of face than before and a settling of himself comfortably, which included a squeeze of the young lady before mentioned, he launched into some new wonder surpassing all the others

The setting sun shed his last golden rays upon this little party, who, absorbed in their present occupation, took no heed of the approach of night, or the glory in which the day went down, when the sound of a horse approaching at a good round trot, invading the silence of the hour, caused the reader to make a sudden stop, and the listeners to raise their heads in wonder. Nor was their wonder diminished when a horseman dashed up to the porch, and abruptly checking his steed, inquired where one John Podgers dwelt.

"Here!" cried a dozen voices, while a dozen hands pointed out sturdy John, still basking in the terrors of the

The rider, giving his bridle to one of those who surrounded him, dismounted, and approached John, hat in hand, but with great haste

"Whence come ye?" said John

"From Kingston, master"

"And wherefore?"

"On most pressing business"

"Of what nature?"

"Witchcraft"

Witchcraft! Everybody looked aghast at the breathless messenger, and the breathless messenger looked equally aghast at everybody—except Will Marks, who, finding himself unobserved, not only squeezed the young lady again, but kissed her twice Surely he must have been bewitched himself, or he never could have done it—and the young lady too, or she never would have let him

"Witchcraft!" cried Will, drowning the sound of his last kiss, which was rather a loud one

The messenger turned towards him and with a frown repeated the word more solemnly than before, then told his errand, which was, in brief, that the people of Kingston had been greatly terrified for some nights past by hideous revels, held by witches beneath the gibbet within a mile of the town, and related and deposed to by chance way-farers who had passed within ear-shot of the spot, that the sound of their voices in their wild orgies had been plainly heard by many persons that three old women

laboured under strong suspicion, and that precedents had been consulted and solemn council had, and it was found that to identify the hags some single person must watch upon the spot alone, that no single person had the courage to perform the task, and that he had been dispatched express to solicit John Podgers to undertake it that very night, as being a man of great renown, who bore a charmed life, and was proof against unholy spells

John received this communication with much composure, and said in a few words, that it would have afforded him inexpressible pleasure to do the Kingston people so slight a service, if it were not for his unfortunate propensity to fall asleep, which no man regretted more than himself upon the present occasion, but which guite settled the question Nevertheless, he said, there was a gentleman present (and here he looked very hard at a tall farrier), who, having been engaged all his life in the manufacture of horse-shoes, must be quite invulnerable to the power of witches, and who, he had no doubt, from his own reputation for bravery and good-nature, would readily accept the commission. The farrier politely thanked him for his good opinion, which it would always be his study to deserve, but added that, with regard to the present little matter, he couldn't think of it on any account, as his departing on such an errand would certainly occasion the instant death of his wife, to whom, as they all knew, he was tenderly attached Now; so far from this circumstance being notorious, everybody had suspected the reverse, as the farrier was in the habit of beating his lady rather more than tender husbands usually do, all the married men present, however, applauded his resolution with great vehemence, and one and all declared that they would stop at home and die if needful (which happily it was not) in defence of their lawful partners

This burst of enthusiasm over, they began to look, as by one consent, towards Will Marks, who, with his cap more on one side than ever, sat watching the proceedings with extraordinary unconcern. He had never been heard openly to express his disbelief in witches, but had often cut such jokes at their expense as left it to be inferred, publicly stating on several occasions that he considered a broomstick an inconvenient charger, and one especially unsuited to the dignity of the female character, and indulging in other free remarks of the same tendency, to the great amusement of his wild companions

As they looked at Will they began to whisper and murmur among themselves, and at length one man cried,

"Why don't you ask Will Marks?"

As this was what everybody had been thinking of, they all took up the word, and cried in concert, "Ah! why don't you ask Will?"

"He don't care," said the farrier

"Not he," added another voice in the crowd

"He don't beheve in it, you know," sneered a little man with a yellow face and a taunting nose and chin, which he thrust out from under the arm of a long man before him

"Besides," said a red-faced gentleman with a gruff voice, "he's a single man."

"That's the point!" said the farrier, and all the married men murmured, ah! that was it, and they only wished they were single themselves, they would show him what spirit was, very soon

The messenger looked towards Will Marks beseechingly "It will be a wet night, friend, and my grey nag is tired after yesterday's work-"

Here there was a general titter

"But," resumed Will, looking about him with a smile, "if nobody else puts in a better claim to go, for the credit of the town I am your man, and I would be, if I had to go afoot In five minutes I shall be in the saddle, unless I am depriving any worthy gentleman here of the honour of the adventure, which I wouldn't do for the world"

But here arose a double difficulty, for not only did John Podgers combat the resolution with all the words he had, which were not many, but the young lady combated it too with all the tears she had, which were very many indeed Will, however, being inflexible, parried his uncle's objections with a joke, and coaxed the young lady into a smile in three short whispers As it was plain that he set his mind upon it, and would go, John Podgers offered him a few first-rate charms out of his own pocket, which he dutifully declined to accept, and the young lady gave him a kiss, which he also returned

"You see what a rare thing it is to be married," said Will, "and how careful and considerate all these husbands are There's not a man among them but his heart is leaping to forestall me in this adventure, and yet a strong sense of duty keeps him back. The husbands in this one little town are a pattern to the world, and so must the wives be too, for that matter, or they could never boast half the influence they have!"

Waiting for no reply to this sarcasm, he snapped his fingers and withdrew into the house, and thence into the stable, while some busied themselves in refreshing the messenger, and others in baiting his steed. In less than the specified time he returned by another way, with a good cloak hanging over his arm, a good sword girded by his side, and leading his good horse caparisoned for the journey.

"Now," said Will, leaping into the saddle at a bound, "up and away Upon your mettle, friend, and push on Good-night!"

He kissed his hand to the girl, nodded to his drowsy uncle, waved his cap to the rest—and off they flew pellmell, as if all the witches in England were in their horses'

legs They were out of sight in a minute

The men who were left behind shook their heads doubtfully, stroked their chins, and shook their heads again. The farrier said that certainly Will Marks was a good horseman, nobody should ever say he denied that but he was lash, very rash, and there was no telling what the end of it might be, what did he go for, that was what he wanted to know? He wished the young fellow no harm, but why did he go? Everybody echoed these words, and shook their heads again, having done which they wished John Podgers good-night, and straggled home to bed

The Kingston people were in their first sleep when Will Marks and his conductor rode through the town and up to the door of a house where sundry grave functionaries were assembled, anxiously expecting the arrival of the renowned

Podgers They were a little disappointed to find a gay young man in his place, but they put the best face upon the matter, and gave him full instructions how he was to conceal himself behind the gibbet, and watch and listen to the witches, and how at a certain time he was to burst forth and cut and slash among them vigorously, so that the suspected parties might be found bleeding in their beds next day, and thoroughly confounded They gave him a great quantity of wholesome advice besides, and—which was more to the purpose with Will—a good supper All these things being done, and midnight nearly come, they sallied forth to show him the spot where he was to keep his dreary vigil

The night was by this time dark and threatening There was a rumbling of distant thunder, and a low sighing of wind among the trees, which was very dismal. The potentates of the town kept so uncommonly close to Will that they trod upon his toes, or stumbled against his ankles, or nearly tripped up his heels at every step he took, and, besides these annoyances, their teeth chattered so with fear, that he seemed to be accompanied by a dirge of castanets

At last they made a halt at the opening of a lonely, desolate space, and, pointing to a black object at some distance, asked Will if he saw that, yonder

"Yes," he replied "What then?"

Informing him abruptly that it was the gibbet where he was to watch, they wished ham good-night in an extremely friendly manner, and ran back as fast as their feet would carry them

Will walked boldly to the gibbet, and, glancing upwards when he came under it, saw—certainly with satisfaction—that it was empty, and that nothing dangled from the top but some iron chains, which swung mournfully to and fro as they were moved by the breeze a After a careful survey of every quarter he determined to take his station with his face towards the town, both because that would place him with his back to the wind, and because, if any trick or surprise were attempted, it would probably come from that direction in the first instance. Having taken these precautions, he wrapped his cloak about him so that it left the handle of his sword free, and ready to his hand, and lean ing against the gallows-tree with his cap not quite so much on one side as it had been before, took up his position for the night

SECOND CHAPTER OF MR PICKWICK'S TALE

We left Will Marks leaning under the gibbet with his face towards the town, scanning the distance with a keen eye, which sought to pierce the darkness and catch the earliest glimpse of any person or persons that might approach towards him. But all was quiet, and, save the howling of the wind as it swept across the heath in gusts, and the creaking of the chains that dangled above his head, there was no sound to break the sullen stillness of the night After half an hour or so this monotony became more disconcerting to Will than the most furious uproar would have been, and he heartily wished for some one antagonist with whom he might have a fair stand-up fight, if it were only to warm himself

Truth to tell, it was a bitter wind, and seemed to blow to the very heart of a man whose blood, heated but now with rapid riding, was the more sensitive to the chilling blast Will was a daring fellow, and cared not a jot for hard knocks or sharp blades, but he could not persuade himself to move or walk about, having just that vague expectation of a sudden assault which made it a comfortable thing to have something at his back, even though that something were a gallows-tree He had no great faith in the superstitions of the age, still such of them as occurred to him did not serve to lighten the time, or to render his situation the more endurable He remembered how witches were said to repair at that ghostly hour to churchyards and gibbets, and such-like dismal spots, to pluck the bleeding mandrake or scrape the flesh from dead men's bones, as choice ingredients for their spells, how, stealing by night to lonely places, they dug graves with their finger-nails, or anointed themselves, before riding in the air, with a delicate pomatum made of the fat of infants newly boiled These, and many other fabled practices of a no less agreeable nature, and all having some reference to the circumstances in which he was placed, passed and repassed in quick succession through the mind of Will Marks, and adding a shadowy dread to that distrust and watchfulness which his situation inspired, rendered it, upon the whole, sufficiently uncomfortable. As he had foreseen, too, the rain began to descend heavily, and driving before the wind in a thick mist, obscured even those few objects which the darkness of the night had before imperfectly revealed.

"Look!" shrieked a voice "Great Heaven, it has fallen down, and stands erect as if it lived!"

The speaker was close behind him, the voice was almost at his ear. Will threw off his cloak, drew his sword, and darting swiftly round, seized a woman by the wrist, who, recoiling from him with a dreadful shriek, fell struggling upon her knees. Another woman, clad, like her whom he had grasped, in mourning garments, stood rooted to the spot on which they were, gazing upon his face with wild and glaring eyes that quite appalled him

"Say," cried Will, when they had confronted each other thus for some time, "what are ye?"

"Say what are you," returned the woman, "who trouble even this obscene resting-place of the dead, and strip the gibbet of its honoured burden? Where is the body?"

He looked in wonder and affright from the woman who questioned him to the other whose arm he clutched

"Where is the body?" repeated his questioner more firmly than before "You wear no livery which marks you for the hireling of the government. You are no friend to us, or I should recognize you, for the friends of such as we are few in number. What are you then, and wherefore are you here?"

"I am no foe to the distressed and helpless," said Will "Are ye among that number? ye should be by your looks"

"We are!" was the answer

"Is it ye who have been wailing and weeping here under cover of the night?" said Will

"It is," replied the woman sternly, and pointing, as she spoke, towards her companion, "she mourns a husband, and I a brother Even the bloody law that wreaks its vengeance on the dead does not make that a crime, and if it did twould be alike to us who are past its fear or favoui

Will glanced at the two females, and coold barely discern that the one whom he addressed was much the elder, and that the other was young and of a slight figure. Both were deadly pale, their garments wet and worn, their hair dishevelled and streaming in the wind, themselves bowed down with grief and misery, their whole appearance most dejected, wretched, and forlorn. A sight so different from any he had expected to encounter touched him to the quick, and all idea of anything but their pitiable condition vanished before it

"I am a rough, blunt yeoman," said Will "Why I came here is told in a word, you have been overheard at a distance in the silence of the night, and I have undertaken a watch for hags or spirits. I came here expecting an adventure, and prepared to go through with any. If there be aught that I can do to help or aid you, name it, and on the faith of a man who can be secret and trusty, I will stand by you to the death"

"How comes this gibbet to be empty?" asked the elder

"I swear to you," replied Will, "that I know as little as yourself But this I know, that when I came here an hour ago or so, it was as it is now, and if, as I gather from your question, it was not so last night, sure I am that it has been secretly disturbed without the knowledge of the folks in yonder town Bethink you, therefore, whether you have no friends in league with you or with him on whom the law has done its worst, by whom these sad remains have been removed for burial"

The women spoke together, and Will retired a pace or two while they conversed apart. He could hear them sob and moan, and saw that they wrung their hands in fruitless agony. He could make out little that they said, but between whiles he gathered enough to assure him that his suggestion was not very wide of the mark, and that they not only suspected by whom the body had been removed, but also whither it had been conveyed. When they had been in conversation a long time, they turned towards him once more This time the younger female spoke

"You have offered us your help?"

"I have"

"And given a pledge that you are still willing to re deem?"

"Yes $\,\,$ So far as I may, keeping all plots and conspiracies at arm's length"

"Follow us, friend"

Will, whose self-possession was now quite restored, needed no second bidding, but with his drawn sword in his hand, and his cloak so muffled over his left arm as to serve for a kind of shield without offering any impediment to its free action, suffered them to lead the way. Through mud and mire, and wind and rain, they walked in silence a full mile. At length they turned into a dark lane, where, suddenly starting out from beneath some trees where he had taken shelter, a man appeared, having in his charge three saddled horses. One of these (his own apparently), in obedience to a whisper from the women, he consigned to Will, who, seeing that they mounted, mounted also Then, without a word spoken, they rode on together, leaving the attendant behind

They made no halt nor slackened their pace until they arrived near Putney. At a large wooden house which stood apart from any other they alighted, and giving their horses to one who was already waiting, passed in by a side door, and so up some narrow creaking stairs into a small panelled chamber, where Will was left alone. He had not been here very long, when the door was softly opened, and there entered to him a cavalier whose face was concealed beneath a black mask

Will stood upon his guard, and scrutinized this figure from head to foot. The form was that of a man pretty far advanced in life, but of a firm and stately carriage. His dress was of a rich and costly kind, but so soiled and disordered that it was scarcely to be recognized for one of those gorgeous suits which the expensive taste and fashion of the time prescribed for men of any rank or station. He was booted and spurred, and bore about him even as many tokens of the state of the roads as Will himself All this he noted, while the eyes behind the mask regarded him with equal attention This survey over, the cavalier broke silence

thou art?"

- "The two first I am," returned Will "The last I have scarcely thought of But be it so Say that I would be richer than I am, what then?"
 - "The way lies before thee now," replied the Mask.

"Show it me"

"First let me inform thee that thou wert brought here to-night lest thou shouldst too soon have told thy tale to those who placed thee on the watch"

"I thought as much when I followed," said Will "But I am no blab, not I"

"Good," returned the Mask "Now listen He who was to have executed the enterprise of burying that body, which, as thou hast suspected, was taken down to-night, has left us in our need"

Will nodded, and thought within himself that if the Mask were to attempt to play any tricks, the first eyelet-hole on the left-hand side of his doublet, counting from the buttons up the front, would be a very good place in which to pink

"Thou art here, and the emergency is desperate I propose his task to thee Convey the body (now coffined in this house), by means that I shall show, to the church of St Dunstan in London to-morrow night, and thy service shall be richly paid Thou'rt about to ask whose corpse it is Seek not to know I warn thee, seek not to know Felons hang in chains on every moor and heath Believe, as others do, that this was one, and ask no further The murders of state policy, its victims or avengers, had best remain unknown to such as thee"

"The mystery of this service," said Will, "bespeaks its danger What is the reward?"

"One hundred golden unities," replied the cavalier "The danger to one who cannot be recognized as the friend of a fallen cause is not great, but there is some hazard to be run Decide between that and the reward"

"What if I refuse?" said Will

"Depart in peace, in God's name," returned the Mask in a melancholy tone, "and keep our secret, remembering that those who brought thee here were crushed and stricken women, and that those who bade thee go free could have had thy life with one word, and no man the wiser"

Men were readier to undertake desperate adventures in those times than they are now—In this case the temptation was great, and the punishment, even in case of detection, was not likely to be very severe, as Will came of a loyal stock, and his uncle was in good repute, and a passable tale to account for his possession of the body and his ignorance

The cavalier explained that a covered cart had been prepared for the purpose, that the time of departure could be arranged so that he should reach London Bridge at dusk, and proceed through the City after the day had closed in, that people would be ready at his journey's end to place the coffin in a vault without a minute's delay, that officious inquirers in the streets would be easily repelled by the tale that he was carrying for interment the corpse of one who had died of the plague, and in short showed him every reason why he should succeed, and none why he should After a time they were joined by another gentleman, masked like the first, who added new arguments to those which had been already urged, the wretched wife, too, added her tears and prayers to their calmer representations, and in the end, Will, moved by compassion and good-nature, by a love of the marvellous, by a mischievous anticipation of the terrors of the Kingston people when he should be missing next day, and finally, by the prospect of gain, took upon himself the task, and devoted all his energies to its successful execution

The following night, when it was quite dark, the hollow echoes of old London Bridge responded to the rumbling of the cart which contained the ghastly load, the object of Will Marks' care Sufficiently disguised to attract no attention by his garb, Will walked at the horse's head, as unconcerned as a man could be who was sensible that he

It was now eight o'clock After nine, none could walk the streets without danger of their lives, and even at this hour, robberies and murder were of no uncommon occur-The shops upon the bridge were all closed, the low wooden arches thrown across the way were like so many black pits, in every one of which ill-favoured fellows lurked in knots of three or four, some standing upright against the wall, lying in wait, others skulking in gateways, and thrusting out their uncombed heads and scowling eyes, others crossing and recrossing, and constantly jostling both horse and man to provoke a quarrel, others stealing away and summoning their companions in a low whistle Once, even in that short passage, there was the noise of scuffling and the clash of swords behind him, but Will, who knew the City and its ways, kept straight on and scarcely turned his head

The streets being unpaved, the rain of the night before had converted them into a perfect quagmire, which the splashing water-spouts from the gables, and the filth and offal cast from the different houses, swelled in no small degree These odious matters, being left to putrefy in the close and heavy air, emitted an insupportable stench, to which every court and passage poured forth a contribution of its own Many parts, even of the main streets, with their projecting stories tottering overhead and nearly shutting out the sky, were more like huge chimneys than open ways At the corners of some of these, great bonfires were burning to prevent infection from the plague, of which it was rumoured that some citizens had lately died, and few, who availing themselves of the light thus afforded paused for a moment to look around them, would have been disposed to doubt the existence of the disease, or wonder at its dreadful visitations

But it was not in such scenes as these, or even in the deep and miry road, that Will Marks found the chief obstacles to his progress There were kites and ravens feeding in the streets (the only scavengers the City kept), who, scenting what he carried, followed the cart or fluttered on its top, and croaked their knowledge of its burden and their ravenous appetite for prey There were distant fires, where the poor wood and plaster tenements wasted fiercely, and whither crowds made their way, clamouring eagerly for plunder, beating down all who came within their reach, and yelling like devils let loose There were single-handed men flying from bands of ruffians, who pursued them with naked weapons, and hunted them savagely, there were drunken, desperate robbers issuing from their dens and staggering through the open streets where no man dared molest them, there were vagabond servitors returning from the Bear Garden, where had been good sport that day, dragging after them their torn and bleeding dogs, or leaving them to die and rot upon the Nothing was abroad but cruelty, violence, and disorder

Many were the interruptions which Will Marks encountered from these stragglers, and many the narrow escapes he Now some stout bully would take his seat upon the cart, insisting to be driven to his own home, and now two or three men would come down upon him together, and demand that on peril of his life he showed them what he had inside Then a party of the city watch, upon their rounds, would draw across the road, and not satisfied with his tale, question him closely, and revenge themselves by a little cuffing and hustling for maltreatment sustained at other hands that night All these assailants had to be rebutted, some by fair words, some by foul, and some by But Will Marks was not the man to be stopped or turned back now he had penetrated so far, and though he got on slowly, still he made his way down Fleet Street and reached the church at last

As he had been forewarned, all was in readiness Directly he stopped, the coffin was removed by four men, who appeared so suddenly that they seemed to have started from the earth A fifth mounted the cart, and scarcely allowing Will time to snatch from it a little bundle containing such of his own clothes as he had thrown off on assuming his disguise, drove briskly away Will never saw cart or man again

He followed the body into the church, and it was well he lost no time in doing so, for the door was immediately closed. There was no light in the building save that which came from a couple of torches borne by two men in cloaks, who stood upon the brink of a vault. Each supported a female figure, and all observed a profound silence

By this dim and solemn glare, which made Will feel as though light itself were dead, and its tomb the dreary arches that frowned above, they placed the coffin in the vault, with uncovered heads, and closed it up. One of the torch-bearers then turned to Will, and stretched forth his hand, in which was a purse of gold. Something told him directly that those were the same eyes which he had seen beneath the mask

"Take it," said the cavalier in a low voice, "and be happy Though these have been hasty obsequies, and no priest has blessed the work, there will not be the less peace with thee thereafter, for having laid his bones beside those of his little children Keep thy own counsel, for thy sake no less than ours, and God be with thee!"

"The blessing of a widowed mother on thy head, good friend!" cried the younger lady through her tears, "the blessing of one who has now no hope or rest but in this

Will stood with the purse in his hand, and involuntarily made a gesture as though he would return it, for though a thoughtless fellow, he was of a frank and generous nature. But the two gentlemen, extinguishing their torches, cautioned him to be gone, as their common safety would be endangered by a longer delay, and at the same time their retreating footsteps sounded through the church. He turned, therefore, towards the point at which he had entered, and seeing by a faint, gleam in the distance that the door was again partially open, groped his way towards it and so passed into the street.

Meantime the local authorities of Kingston had kept watch and ward all the previous night, fancying every now and then that dismal shrieks were borne towards them on the wind, and frequently winking to each other, and drawing closer to the fire as they drank the health of the lonely sentinel, upon whom a clerical gentleman present was especially severe by reason of his levity and youthful folly. Two or three of the gravest in company, who were of a theological turn, propounded to him the question, whether such a character was not but poorly armed for single combat with the Devil, and whether he himself would not have been a stronger opponent, but the clerical gentleman, sharply reproving them for their presumption in discussing such questions, clearly showed that a fitter champion than Will could scarcely have been selected, not only for that, being a child of Satan, he was the less likely to be alarmed by the appearance of his own father, but because Satan himself would be at his ease in such company, and would not scruple to kick up his heels to an extent which it was quite certain he would never venture before clerical eyes, under whose influence (as was notorious) he became quite a tame and milk-and-water character

But when next morning arrived, and with it no Will Marks, and when a strong party, repairing to the spot, as a strong party ventured to do in broad day, found Will gone and the gibbet empty, matters grew serious indeed. The day passing away and no news arriving, and the night going on also without any intelligence, the thing grew more tremendous still, in short, the neighbourhood worked itself up to such a comfortable pitch of mystery and horror, that it is a great question whether the general feeling was not one of excessive disappointment, when, on the second morning, Will Marks returned

However this may be, back Will came in a very cool and collected state, and appearing not to trouble himself much about anybody except old John Podgers, who, having been sent for, was sitting in the Town Hall crying slowly, and dozing between whiles Having embraced his uncle and assured him of his safety, Will mounted on a table and told his story to the crowd

And surely they would have been the most unreasonable crowd that ever assembled together, if they had been in the least respect disappointed with the tale he told them, for besides describing the Witches' Dance to the minutest motion of their legs, and performing it in character on the table, with the assistance of a broomstick, he related how they had carried off the body in a copper caldron, and so bewitched him, that he lost his senses until he found himself lying under a hedge at least ten miles off, whence he had straightway returned as they then beheld. The story gained such universal applause that it soon afterwards brought down express from London the great witch-finder of the age, the Heaven-born Hopkins, who having examined Will closely on several points, pronounced it the most extraordinary and the best accredited witch story ever known, under which title it was published at the Three Bibles on London Bridge in small quarto, with a view of the caldron from an original drawing, and a portrait of the clerical gentleman as he sat by the fire

On one point Will was particularly careful and that was to describe, for the witches he had seen, three impossible old females, whose likenesses never were or will be Thus he saved the lives of the suspected parties, and of all other old women who were dragged before him to be identified

This circumstance occasioned John Podgers much grief and sorrow, until happening one day to cast his eyes upon his housekeeper, and observing her to be plainly afflicted with rheumatism, he procured her to be burnt as an undoubted witch. For this service to the state he was immediately knighted, and became from that time Sir John Podgers

Will Marks never gained any clue to the mystery in which he had been an actor, nor did, any inscription in the church, which he often visited afterwards, nor any of the limited inquiries that he dared to make, yield him the least assistance. As he kept his own secret, he was compelled to spend the gold discreetly and sparingly. In the course of time he married the young lady of whom I have already told you, whose maider name is not recorded, with whom he led a prosperous and happy life. Years and years after this adventure, it was his wont to tell her upon a stormy night that it was a great comfort to him to think those bones, to whomsoever they might have once belonged, were not bleaching in the troubled air, but were mouldering away with the dust of their own kith and kindred in a quiet grave

FURTHER PARTICULARS OF MASTER HUMPHREY'S VISITOR

Being very full of Mr Pickwick's application, and highly pleased with the compliment he had paid me, it will be readily supposed that long before our next night of meeting I communicated it to my three friends, who unanimously voted his admission into our body. We all looked forward with some impatience to the occasion which would enroll him among us, but I am greatly mistaken if Jack Redburn and myself were not by many degrees the most impatient of the party.

At length the night came, and a few minutes after ten Mr Pickwick's knock was heard at the street-door He was shown into a lower room, and I directly took my crooked stick and went to accompany him upstairs, in order that he might be presented with all honour and

"Mr Pickwick," said I, on entering the room, "I am rejoiced to see you,—rejoiced to believe that this is but the opening of a long series of visits to this house, and but the beginning of a close and lasting friendship"

That gentleman made a suitable reply with a cordiality and frankness peculiarly his own, and glanced with a smile towards two persons behind the door, whom I had not at first observed, and whom I immediately recognized as Mr

Samuel Weller and his father

It was a warm evening, but the elder Mr Weller was attired, notwithstanding, in a most capacious greatcoat, and his chin enveloped in a large speckled shawl, such as is usually worn by stage coachmen on active service. He looked very rosy and very stout, especially about the legs, which appeared to have been compressed into his top boots with some difficulty. His broad-brimmed hat he held under his left arm, and with the forefinger of his right hand he touched his forehead a great many times in acknowledgment of my presence.

"I am very glad to see you in such good health, Mr Weller," said I

"Why, thankee, sir," returned Mr Weller, "the axle an't

broke yet We keeps up a steady pace,—not too sewere, but vith a moderate degree o' friction,—and the consekens is that ve're still a runnin' and comes in to the time reg'lar—My son Samivel, sir, as you may have read on in history," added Mr Weller, introducing his first-born

"Samivel Veller, sir," said the old gentleman, "has conferred upon me the ancient title o' grandfather vich had long laid dormouse, and wos s'posed to be nearly hex-tinct in our family Sammy, relate a anecdote o' vun o' them boys,—that 'ere little anecdote about young Tony sayin' as he vould smoke a pipe unbeknown to his mother"

"Be quiet, can't you?" said Sam, "I never see such a

"That 'ere Tony is the blessedest boy," said Mr Weller, heedless of this rebuff, "the blessedest boy as ever I see in my days! of all the charmin'est infants as ever I heerd tell on, includin' them as was kivered over by the robin-redbreasts arter they'd committed sooicide with blackberries, there never wos any like that 'ere little Tony He's alvays a playin' vith a quart pot, that boy is! To see him a settin' down on the doorstep pretending to drink out of it, and fetching a long breath artervards, and smoking a bit of fire-vood, and sayin', 'Now I'm grandfather,'—to see him a doin' that at two year old is better than any play as wos ever wrote 'Now I'm grandfather!' He wouldn't take a pint pot if you wos to make 'mm a present on it, but he gets his quart, and then he says, 'Now I'm grandfather!'"

Mr Weller was so overpowered by this picture that he straightway fell into a most alarming fit of coughing, which must certainly have been attended with some fatal result but for the dexterity and promptitude of Sam, who, taking a firm grasp of the shawl just under his father's chin, shook him to and fro with great violence, at the same time administering some smart blows between his shoulders. By this curious mode of treatment Mr Weller was finally recovered, but with a very crimson face, and in a state of great exhaustion

"He'll do now, Sam," said Mi Pickwick, who had been in some alarm himself

"He'll do, sir!" cried Sam, looking reproachfully at his parent "Yes, he will do one o' these days,—he'll do for his-self and then he'll wish he hadn't Did anybody ever see sich a inconsiderate old file,—laughing into conwulsions afore company, and stamping on the floor as if he'd brought his own carpet with him and wos under a wager to punch the pattern out in a given time? He'll begin again in a minute There—he's a-goin' off—I said he would!"

In fact, Mr Weller, whose mind was still running upon his precocious grandson, was seen to shake his head from side to side, while a laugh, working like an earthquake, below the surface, produced various extraordinary appearances in his face, chest, and shoulders,—the more alarming because unaccompanied by any noise whatever These emotions, however, gradually subsided, and after three or four short relapses he wiped his eyes with the cuff of his coat, and looked about him with tolerable composure

"Afore the governor vith-draws," said Mr Weller, "there is a pint, respecting vich Sammy has a question to ask Vile that question is a perwadin this here conwersa-

"Wot are you goin' away for?" demanded Sam, seizing

his father by the coat-tail

"I never see such a undootiful boy as you, Samivel," returned Mr Weller "Didn't you make a solemn promise, amountin' almost to a speeches o' wow, that you'd put that 'ere question on my account?"

"Well, I'm agreeable to do it," said Sam, "but not if you go cuttin' away like that, as the bull turned round and mildly observed to the drover ven they wos a goadin' him into the butcher's door. The fact is, sir," said Sam, addressing me, "that he wants to know somethin' respectin' that 'ere lady as is housekeeper here"

"Ay What is that?"

"Vy, sir," said Sam, grinning still more, "he wishes to know vether she——"

"In short," interposed old Mr Weller decisively, a perspiration breaking out upon his forehead, "vether that 'ere old creetur is or is not a widder"

Mr Pickwick laughed heartily, and so did I, as I replied decisively, that "my housekeeper was a spinster"

"There!" cried Sam, "now you're satisfied

"A wot?" said his father, with deep scorn

"A spinster," replied Sam

Mr Weller looked very hard at his son for a minute or two, and then said,-

"Never mind vether she makes jokes or not, that's no matter Wot I say is, is that 'ere female a widder, or is she not?"

"Wot do you mean by her making jokes?" demanded

Sam, quite aghast at the obscurity of his parent's speech "Never you mind, Samivel," returned Mr Weller gravely, "puns may be wery good things or they may be wery bad 'uns, and a female may be none the better or she may be none the vurse for making of 'em, that's got nothing to do vith widders"

"Wy now," said Sam, looking round, "would anybody believe as a man at his time o' life could be running his head agin spinsters and punsters being the same thing?"

"There an't a straw's difference between 'em," said Mr Weller "Your father didn't drive a coach for so many years not to be ekal to his own languidge as far as that

Avoiding the question of etymology, upon which the old gentleman's mind was quite made up, he was several times assured that the housekeeper had never been married He expressed great satisfaction on hearing this, and apologized for the question, remarking that he had been greatly terrified by a widow not long before, and that his natural timidity was increased in consequence

"It was on the rail," said Mr Weller, with strong emphasis, "I was a goin' down to Birmingham by the rail, and I wos locked up in a close carriage with a living widder Alone we wos, the widder and me wos alone, and I believe it was only because we was alone and there wos no clergyman in the conwavance, that that 'ere widder didn't marry me afore ve reached the half-way station. Ven I think how she began a screaming as we wos a-goin' under them tunnels in the dark,—how she kept on a faintin' and ketchin' hold o' me,—and how I tried to bust open the door as was tight-locked and perwented all escape—Ah! It was a awful thing, most awful!"

Mr Weller was so very much overcome by this retrospect that he was unable, until he had wiped his brow several times, to return any reply to the question whether he approved of railway communication, notwithstanding that it would appear, from the answer which he ultimately gave, that he entertained strong opinions on the subject

"I con-sider," said Mr Weller, "that the rail is unconstitootional and an inwaser o' privileges, and I should werv much like to know what that 'ere old Carter as once stood up for our liberties and wun 'em too,-I should like to know wot he vould say, if he wos alive now, to Englishmen being locked up vith widders, or with anybody again their wills Wot a old Carter would have said a old Coachman may say, and I as-sert that in that pintio' view alone, the rail is an inwaser As to the comfort, vere's the comfort o' sittin' in a harm-cheer lookin' at brick walls or heaps o' mud, never comin' to a public-house, never seein' a glass o' ale, never goin' through a pike, never meetin' a change o' no kind (horses or othervise), but alvays comin' to a place, ven you come to one at all, the wery picter o' the last, vith the same p'leesemen standing about, the same blessed old bell a ringin', the same unfort'nate people standing behind the bars, a waitin' to be let in, and everythin' the same except the name, vich is wrote up in the same sized letters as the last name, and vith the same colours As to the honour and dignity o' travellin', vere can that be vithout a coachman, and wot's the rail to sich coachmen and guards as is sometimes forced to go by it, but a outrage and a insult? As to the pace, wot sort o' pace do you think I, Tony Veller, could have kept a coach goin' at, for five hundred thousand pound a mile, paid in adwance afore the coach was on the road? And as to the ingein,-a nasty, wheezin', creakin', gaspin', puffin', bustin' monster, alvays out o' breath, vith a shiny green-and-gold

back, like a unpleasant beetle in that 'ere gas magnifier,—as to the ingein as is always a pourin' out red-hot coals at night and black smoke in the day, the sensiblest thing it does, in my opinion, is, ven there's somethin' in the way, and it sets up that 'ere frightful scream vich seems to say, "Now here's two hundred and forty passengers in the wery greatest extremity o' danger, and here's their two hundred and forty screams in vun!'"

By this time I began to fear that my friends would be rendered impatient by my protracted absence I therefore begged Mr Pickwick to accompany me upstairs, and left the two Mr Wellers in the care of the housekeeper, laying strict injunctions upon her to treat them with all possible

THE CLOCK

As we were going upstairs, Mr Pickwick put on his spectacles, which he had held in his hand hitherto, arranged his neckerchief, smoothed down his waistcoat, and made many other little preparations of that kind which men are accustomed to be mindful of, when they are going among strangers for the first time, and are anxious to impress them pleasantly. Seeing that I smiled, he smiled too, and said that if it had occurred to him before he left home, he would certainly have presented himself in pumps and silk stockings.

"I would, indeed, my dear sir," he said very seriously, "I would have shown my respect for the society, by laying aside my gaiters"

"You may rest assured," said I, "that they would have regretted your doing so very much, for they are quite at-

"No, really!" cried Mr Pickwick, with manifest pleas ure "Do you think they care about my gaiters? Do you seriously think that they identify me at all with my gaiters?

"I am sure they do," I replied

"Well, now," said Mr Pickwick, "that is one of the most charming and agreeable circumstances that could possibly have occurred to me!"

I should not have written down this short conversation, but that it developed a slight point in Mr Pickwick's character, with which I was not previously acquainted. He has a secret pride in his legs. The manner in which he spoke, and the accompanying glance he bestowed upon his tights, convince me that Mr Pickwick regards his legs with much innocent vanity.

"But here are our friends," said I, opening the door and taking his arm in mine, "let them speak for themselves —

Gentlemen, I present to you Mr Pickwick"

Mr Pickwick and I must have been a good contrast just then I, leaning quietly on my crutch-stick, with something of a careworn, patient air, he, having hold of my arm, and bowing in every direction with the most elastic politeness, and an expression of face whose sprightly cheerfulness and good-humour knew no bounds. The difference between us must have been more striking yet, as we advanced towards the table, and the amiable gentleman, adapting his jocund step to my poor tread, had his attention divided between treating my infirmities with the utmost consideration, and affecting to be wholly unconscious that I required any

I made him personally known to each of my friends in turn. First, to the deaf gentleman, whom he regarded with much interest, and accosted with great frankness and cordiality. He had evidently some vague idea, at the moment, that my friend being deaf must be dumb also, for when the latter opened his lips to express the pleasure it afforded him to know a gentleman of whom he had heard so much, Mr Pickwick was so extremely disconcerted, that

His meeting with Jack Redburn was quite a treat to see Mr Pickwick smiled, and shook hands, and looked at him through his spectacles, and under them, and over them, and nodded his head approvingly, and then nodded to me, as much as to say, "This is just the man, you were quite right," and then turned to Jack and said a few hearty words, and then did and said everything over again with unimpaired vivacity. As to Jack himself, he was quite as much delighted with Mr. Pickwick as Mr. Pickwick could possibly be with him. Two people never can have met together since the world began, who exchanged a warmer or more enthusiastic greeting.

It was amusing to observe the difference between this encounter and that which succeeded, between Mr Pickwick and Mr Miles It was clear that the latter gentleman viewed our new member as a kind of rival in the affections of Jack Redburn, and besides this, he had more than once hinted to me, in secret, that although he had no doubt Mr Pickwick was a very worthy man, still he did consider that some of his exploits were unbecoming a gentleman of his years and gravity Over and above these grounds of distrust, it is one of his fixed opinions, that the law never can by possibility do anything wrong, he therefore looks upon Mr Pickwick as one who has justly suffered in purse and peace for a breach of his plighted faith to an unprotected female, and holds that he is called upon to regard him with some suspicion on that account These causes led to a rather cold and formal reception, which Mr Pickwick acknowledged with the same stateliness and intense politeness as was displayed on the other side Indeed, he assumed an air of such majestic defiance, that I was fearful he might break out into some solemn protest or declaration, and therefore inducted him into his chair without a moment's delay

This piece of generalship was perfectly successful. The instant he took his seat, Mr. Pickwick surveyed us all with a most benevolent aspect, and was taken with a fit of smiling full five minutes long. His interest in our ceremonies was immense. They are not very numerous or complicated, and a description of them may be comprised in very few words. As our transactions have already been, and must necessarily continue to be, more or less anticipated by being presented in these pages at different times, and under various forms, they do not require a detailed account.

Our first proceeding when we are assembled is to shake hands all round, and greet each other with cheerful and pleasant looks Remembering that we assemble not only for the promotion of our happiness, but with the view of adding something to the common stock, an air of langour or indifference in any member of our body would be regarded by the others as a kind of treason. We have never had an offender in this respect, but if we had, there is no doubt that he would be taken to task pretty severely

Our salutation over, the venerable piece of antiquity from which we take our name is wound up in silence This ceremony is always performed by Master Humphrey himself (in treating of the club, I may be permitted to assume the historical style, and speak of myself in the third person), who mounts upon a chair for the purpose, armed with a large key While it is in progress, Jack Redburn is required to keep at the farther end of the room under the guardianship of Mr Miles, for he is known to entertain certain aspiring and unhallowed thoughts connected with the clock, and has even gone so far as to state that if he might take the works out for a day or two, he thinks he could improve them We pardon him his presumption in consideration of his good intentions and his keeping this respectful distance, which last penalty is insisted on, lest by secretly wounding the object of our regard in some tender part, in the ardour of his zeal for its improvement, he should fill us with dismay and consternation

The next ceremony is the opening of the clock-case (of which Master Humphrey has likewise the key), the taking from it as many papers as will furnish forth our evening's entertainment, and arranging in the recess such new contributions as have been provided since our last meeting. This is always done with peculiar solemnity. The deaf gentleman then fills and lights his pipe, and we once more take our seats round the table before mentioned, Master Humphrey acting as president,—if we can be said to have any president, where all are on the same social footing,— and our friend Jack as secretary Our preliminaries being now concluded, we fall into any train of conversation that happens to suggest itself, or proceed immediately to one of our readings. In the latter case, the paper selected is consigned to Master Humphrey, who flattens it carefully on the table and makes dog's ears in the corner of every page, ready for turning over easily, Jack Redburn trims the lamp with a small machine of his own invention, which usually puts it out, Mr Miles looks on with great approval notwithstanding, the deaf gentleman draws in his chair, so that he can follow the words on the paper or on Master Humphrey's lips as he pleases, and Master Humphrey himself, looking round with mighty gratification, and glancing up at his old clock, begins to read aloud

Mr Pickwick's face, while his tale was being read, would have attracted the attention of the dullest man alive The complacent motion of his head and forefinger as he gently beat time, and corrected the air with imaginary punctuation, the smile that mantled on his features at every jocose passage, and the sly look he stole around to observe its effect, the calm manner in which he shut his eyes and listened when there was some little piece of description, the changing expression with which he acted the dialogue to himself, his agony that the deaf gentleman should know what it was all about, and his extraordinary anxiety to correct the reader when he hesitated at a word in the manuscript, or substituted a wrong one, were alike worthy of And when at last, endeavouring to communicate with the deaf gentleman by means of the finger alphabet, with which he constructed such words as are unknown in any civilized or savage language, he took up a slate and wrote in large text, one word in a line, the question, "How -do-you-like-it?"-when he did this, and handing it over the table awaited the reply, with a countenance only brightened and improved by his great excitement, even Mr Miles relaxed, and could not forbear looking at him for the moment with interest and favour

"It has occurred to me," said the deaf gentleman, who had watched Mr Pickwick and everybody else with silent satisfaction—"it has occurred to me," said the deaf gentle-

As our conversation had naturally turned upon the vacant seat, we lent a willing ear to this remark, and looked at our friend inquiringly

"I feel sure," said he, "that Mr Pickwick must be acquainted with somebody who would be an acquisition to us, that he must know the man we want Pray let us not lose any time, but set this question at rest Is it so, Mr Pickwick?"

The gentleman addressed was about to return a verbal reply, but remembering our friend's infirmity, he substituted for this kind of answer some fifty nods. Then taking up the slate and printing on it a gigantic "Yes," he handed it across the table, and rubbing his hands as he looked round upon our faces, protested that he and the deaf gentleman quite understood each other already

"The person I have in my mind," said Mr Pickwick, "and whom I should not have presumed to mention to you until some time hence, but for the opportunity you have given me, is a very strange old man His name is Bamber"

"Bamber!" said Jack "I have certainly heard the

"I have no doubt, then," returned Mr Pickwick, "that you remember him in those adventures of mine (the Posthumous Papers of our old club, I mean), although he is only incidentally mentioned, and, if I remember right, appears but once "

"That's it," said Jack "Let me see He is the person who has a grave interest in old mouldy chambers and the Inns of Court, and who relates some anecdotes having reference to his favourite theme,—and an odd ghost story,

-is that the man?"

"The very same Now," spid Mr Pickwick, lowering his voice to a mysterious and confidential tone, "he is a very extraordinary and remarkable person, living, and talking, and looking, like some strange spirit, whose delight is to haunt old buildings, and absorbed in that one subject which you have just mentioned, to an extent which is quite wonderful When I retired into private life, I sought him out, and I do assure you that the more I see of him, the more strongly I am impressed with the strange and dreamy character of his mind "

"Where does he live?" I inquired

"He lives," said Mr Pickwick, "in one of those dull, lonely old places with which his thoughts and stories are all connected, quite alone, and often shut up close for several weeks together. In this dusty solitude he broods upon the fancies he has so long indulged, and when he goes into the world, or anybody from the world without goes to see him, they are still present to his mind and still his favourite topic. I may say, I believe, that he has brought himself to entertain a regard for me, and an interest in my visits, feelings which I am certain he would extend to Master Humphrey's Clock if he were once tempted to join us. All I wish you to understand is, that he is a strange secluded visionary, in the world but not of it, and as unlike anybody here as he is unlike anybody elsewhere that I have ever met or known."

Mr Miles received this account of our proposed companion with rather a wry face, and after murmuring that perhaps he was a little mad, inquired if he were rich

"I never asked him," said Mi Pickwick

"You might know, sir, for all that," retorted Mr Miles,

"Perhaps so, sir," said Mr Pickwick, no less sharply than the other, "but I do not." Indeed," he added, relapsing into his usual mildness, "I have no means of judging He lives poorly, but that would seem to be in keeping with his character. I never heard him allude to his circumstances, and never fell into the society of any man who had the slightest acquaintance with them. I have really told you all I know about him, and it rests with you to say whether you wish to know more, or know quite enough already."

We were unanimously of opinion that we would seek to know more, and as a sort of compromise with Mr Miles (who, although he said "Yes—O certainly—he should like to know more about the gentleman—he had no right to put himself in opposition to the general wish," and so forth, shook his head doubtfully and hemmed several times with peculiar gravity) it was arranged that Mr Pickwick should carry me with him on an evening visit to the subject of our discussion, for which purpose an early appointment between that gentleman and myself was immediately agreed upon, it being understood that I was to act upon my own responsibility, and to invite him to join us or not, as I might think proper This solemn question determined, we returned to the clock-case (where we have been forestalled by the reader), and between its contents, and the conversation they occasioned, the remainder of our time passed very quickly

When we broke up, Mr Pickwick took me aside to tell me that he had spent a most charming and delightful even ing Having made this communication with an air of the strictest secrecy, he took Jack Redburn into another corner to tell him the same, and then retired into another corner with the deaf gentleman and the slate, to repeat the assurance It was amusing to observe the contest in his mind whether he should extend his confidence to Mr Miles, or treat him with dignified reserve Half-a-dozen times he stepped up behind him with a friendly air, and as often stepped back again without saying a word, at last, when he was close at that gentleman's ear and upon the very point of whispering something conciliating and agreeable, Mr Miles happened suddenly to turn his head, upon which Mr Pickwick skipped away, and said with some fierceness, "Good-night, sir-I was about to say good-night, sir,nothing more," and so made a bow and left him

"Now, Sam," said Mr Pickwick, when he had got down-

Mr Pickwick acted upon tifese directions, and being further assisted by Sam, who pulled at one side of the collar, and Mr Weller, who pulled hard at the other, was speedily enrobed Mr Weller, senior, then produced a full-sized stable lantern, which he had carefully deposited in a remote corner on his arrival, and inquired whether Mr Pickwick would have "the lamps alight"

"I think not to-night," said Mr Pickwick

"Then if this here lady vill per-mit," rejoined Mr Weller, "we'll leave it here, ready for next journey This here lantern, mum," said Mr Weller, handing it to the housekeeper, "vunce belonged to the celebrated Bill Blinder as is now at grass, as all on us vill be in our turns Bill, mum, wos the hostler as had charge o' them two vell-known piebald leaders that run in the Bristol fast coach, and vould never go to no other tune but a sutherly vind and a cloudy sky, which wos consekvently played incessant, by the guard, wenever they wos on duty He wos took wery bad one arternoon, arter having been off his feed, and wery shaky on his legs for some veeks, and he says to his mate, 'Matey,' he says, 'I think I'm a-goin' the wrong side o' the post, and that my foot's wery near the bucket Don't say I an't,' he says, 'for I know I am, and don't let me be interrupted,' he says, 'for I've saved a little money, and I'm a-goin' into the stable to make my last vill and testymint' 'I'll take care as nobody interrupts,' says his mate, 'but you on'y hold up your head, and shake your ears a bit, and you're good for twenty years to come' Bill Blinder makes him no answer, but he goes away into the stable, and there he soon artervards lays himself down atween the two piebalds, and dies,-prevously a writin' outside the corn-chest, 'This is the last vill and testymint of Villiam Blinder' They wos nat'rally wery much amazed at this, and arter looking among the litter, and up in the loft, and vere not, they opens the corn-chest, and finds that he'd been and chalked his vill inside the lid, so the lid was obligated to be took off the hinges, and sent up to Doctor Commons to be proved, and under that 'ere wery instrument this here lantern was passed to Tony Veller, vich circumstarnce, mum, gives it a wally in my eyes, and makes me rekvest, if you vill be so kind, as to take partickler care on it "

The housekeeper graciously promised to keep the object of Mr Weller's regard in the safest possible custody, and Mr Pickwick, with a laughing face, took his leave. The body-guard followed, side by side, old Mr Weller buttoned and wrapped up from his boots to his chin, and Sam with his hands in his pockets and his hat half off his

I was not a little surprised, on turning to go upstairs, to encounter the barber in the passage at that late hour, for his attendance is usually confined to some half-hour in the morning. But Jack Redburn, who finds out (by instinct, I think) everything that happens in the house, informed me with great glee, that a society in imitation of our own had been that night formed in the kitchen, under the title of "Mr Weller's Watch," of which the barber was a member, and that he could pledge himself to find means of making me acquainted with the whole of its future proceedings, which I begged him, both on my own account and that of my readers, by no means to neglect doing *

MR WELLER'S WATCH

It seems that the housekeeper and the two Mr Wellers were no sooner left together on the occasion of their first becoming acquainted, than the housekeeper called to her assistance Mr Slithers the barber, who had been lurking in the kitchen in expectation of her summons, and with many smiles and much sweetness introduced him as one who would assist her in the responsible office of entertaining her distinguished visitors

"Indeed," said she, "without Mr Slithers I should have been placed in quite an awkward situation"

"There is no call for any hock'erdness, mum," said Mr Weller with the utmost politeness, "no call wotsum-ever A lady," added the old gentleman, looking about him with the air of one who establishes an incontrovertible position,—"a lady can't be hock'erd Natur' has otherwise purwided"

The housekeeper inclined her head and smiled yet more sweetly. The barber, who had been fluttering about Mr Weller and Sam in a state of great anxiety to improve their acquaintance, rubbed his hands and cried, "Hear, hear! Very true, sir," whereupon Sam turned about and steadily regarded him for some seconds in silence

"I never knew," said Sam, fixing his eyes in a ruminative manner upon the blushing barber,—"I never knew but vun o' your trade, but he wos worth a dozen, and wos indeed dewoted to his callin'!"

"Both," replied Sam, "easy shavin' was his natur', and cuttin' and curlin' was his pride and glory His whole delight wos in his trade He spent all his money in bears, and run in debt for 'em besides, and there they wos a growling avay down in the front cellar all day long, and ineffectooally gnashing their teeth, vile the grease o' their relations and friends wos being re-tailed in gallipots in the shop above, and the first-floor winder wos ornamented with their heads, not to speak o' the dreadful aggrawation it must have been to 'em' to see a man alvays a walkin' up and down the pavement outside, vith the portrait of a bear in his last agonies, and underneath in large letters, 'Another fine animal wos slaughtered yesterday at Jinkinson's!' Hows'ever, there they wos, and there Jinkinson wos, till he wos took wery ill with some inn'ard disorder, lost the use of his legs, and wos confined to his bed, vere he laid a wery long time, but sich wos his pride in his profession, even then, that wenever he wos worse than usual the doctor used to go downstairs and say, 'Jinkinson's wery low this mornin', we must give the bears a stir, ' and as sure as ever they stirred 'em up a bit and made 'em roar, Jinkinson opens his eyes if he wos ever so bad, calls out, 'There's the bears!' and rewives agin "

"Astonishing!" cried the barber

"Not a bit," said Sam, "human natur' neat as imported Vun day the doctor happenin' to say, 'I shall look in as usual to-morrow mornin',' Iinkinson catches hold of his hand and says, 'Doctor,' he says, 'will you grant me one favour?' 'I will, Jinkinson,' says the doctor 'Then, doctor,' says Jinkinson, 'vill you come unshaved, and let me shave you?' 'I will,' says the doctor 'God bless you,' says Jinkinson Next day the doctor came, and arter he'd been shaved all skilful and reg'lar, he says, 'Jinkinson,' he says, 'it's wery plain this does you good Now,' he says, 'I've got a coachman as has got a beard that it 'ud warm your heart to work on, and though the footman,' he says, 'hasn't got much of a beard, still he's trying it on vith a pair o' viskers to that extent that razors is Christian charity If they take it in turns to mind the carriage when it's a waitin' below,' he says, 'wot's to hinder you from operatin' on both of 'em ev'ry day as well as upon me? you've got six children,' he says, 'wot's to hinder you from shavin' all their heads and keepin' 'em shaved? you've got two assistants in the shop downstairs. wot's to hinder you from cuttin' and curlin' them as often as vou like? Do this,' he says, 'and you're a man agin' linkinson squeedged the doctor's hand and begun that wery day, he kept his tools upon the bed, and wenever he felt his-self gettin' worse, he turned to at vun o' the children who wos a runnin' about the house with heads like clean Dutch cheeses, and shaved him agin Vun day the lawyer come to make his vill, all the time he wos a takin' it down, Jinkinson was secretly a clippin' avay at his hair vith a large pair of scissors 'Wot's that 'ere snippin' noise?' says the lawyer every now and then, 'it's like a man havin' his hair cut' 'It is wery like a man havin' his hair cut,' says poor Jinkinson, hidin' the scissors, and lookin' quite innocent By the time the lawyer found it out, he was wery nearly bald Inkinson wos kept alive in this vay for a long time, but at last run day he has in all the children vun arter another, shaves each on 'em wery clean, and gives him vun kiss on the crown o' his head, then he has in the two assistants, and arter cuttin' and curlin' of 'em in the first style of elegance, says he should like to hear the woice o' the greasiest bear, vich rekvest is immedetly complied with, then he says that he feels wery happy in his mind and vishes to be left alone, and then he dies, previously cuttin' his own hair and makin' one flat curl in the wery middle of his forehead"

This anecdote produced an extraordinary effect, not only upon Mr Slithers, but upon the housekeeper also, who evinced so much anxiety to please and be pleased, that Mr Weller, with a manner betokening some alarm, conveyed a whispered inquiry to his son whether he had gone "too fur"

"Wot do you mean by too fur?" demanded Sam

"In that 'ere little compliment respectin' the want of hock'erdness in ladies, Sammy," replied his father

"You don't think she's fallen in love with you in consekens o' that, do you?" said Sam

"More unlikelier things have come to pass, my boy," replied Mr Weller in a hoarse whisper, "I'm always afterd of inadwertent captiwation, Sammy If I know'd how to make myself ugly or unpleasant, I'd do it, Samivel, rayther than live in this here state of perpetival terror!"

Mr Weller had, at that time, no further opportunity of dwelling upon the apprehensions which beset his mind, for the immediate occasion of his fears proceeded to lead the way downstairs, apologizing as they went for conducting him into the kitchen, which apartment, however, she was induced to proffer for his accommodation in preference to her own little room, the rather as it afforded greater facilities for smoking, and was immediately adjoining the ale-cellar The preparations which were already made sufficiently proved that these were not mere words of course, for on the deal table were a sturdy ale-jug and glasses, flanked with clean pipes and a plentiful supply of tobacco for the old gentleman and his son, while on a dresser hard by was goodly store of cold meat and other eatables At sight of these arrangements Mr Weller was at first distracted between his love of joviality and his doubts whether they were not to be considered as so many evidences of captivation having already taken place, but he soon yielded to his natural impulse, and took his seat at the table with a very jolly countenance

"As to imbibin' any o' this here flagrant veed, mum, in the presence of a lady," said Mr Weller taking up a pipe and laying it down again, "it couldn't be Samivel, total abstinence, if you please"

"But I like it of all things," said the housekeeper

"No," rejoined Mr Weller, shaking his head,—"no"
"Upon my word I do," said the housekeeper "Mr Shithers knows I do"

Mr Weller coughed, and notwithstanding the barber's confirmation of the statement, said "No" again, but more feebly than before. The housekeeper lighted a piece of paper, and insisted on applying it to the bowl of the pipe with her own fair hands, Mr Weller resisted, the housekeeper cried that her fingers would be burnt, Mr Weller gave way. The pipe was ignited, Mr Weller drew a long puff of smoke, and detecting himself in the very act of smiling on the housekeeper, put a sudden constraint upon his countenance and looked sternly at the candle, with a determination not to captivate, himself, or encourage thoughts of captivation in others. From this iron frame of mind he was roused by the voice of his son

"I don't think," said Sam, who was smoking with great composure and enjoyment, "that if the lady wos agreeable it 'ud be wery far out o' the vay for us four to make up a club of our own like the governors does upstairs, and let him" Sam pointed with the stem of his pipe towards his parent, "be the president"

The housekeeper affably declared that it was the very thing she had been thinking of The barber said the same Mr Weller said nothing, but he laid down his pipe as if in a fit of inspiration, and performed the following manœuvres

Unbuttoning the three lower buttons of his waistcoat and pausing for a moment to enjoy the easy flow of breath consequent upon this process, he laid violent hands upon his watch-chain, and slowly and with extreme difficulty drew from his fob an immense double-cased silver watch, which brought the lining of the pocket with it, and was not to be disentangled but by great exertions and an amazing redness of face. Having fairly got it out at last, he detached the outer case and wound it up with a key of corresponding magnitude, then put the case on again and kaving ap-

improve its performance

"That," said Mr Weller, laying it on the table with its face upwards, "is the title and emblem o' this here society Sammy, reach them two stools this vay for the wacant cheers Ladies and gen'lmen, Mr Weller's Watch is yound up and now a-goin' Order!"

By way of enforcing this proclamation, Mr Weller, using the watch after the manner of a president's hammer, and remarking with great pride that nothing hurt it, and that falls and concussions of all kinds materially enhanced the excellence of the works and assisted the regulator, knocked the table a great many times, and declared the association formally constituted

"And don't let's have no grinnin' at the cheer, Samivel," said Mr Weller to his son, "or I shall be committin' you to the cellar, and then p'r'aps we may get into what the 'Merrikins call a fix, and the English a question o' privi

Having uttered this friendly caution, the President settled himself in his chair with great dignity, and requested that Mr Samuel would relate an anecdote

"I've told one," said Sam

"Wery good, sir, tell another," returned the chair

"We wos a talking jist now, sir," said Sam, turning to Slithers, "about barbers Pursuing that 'ere fruitful theme, sır, I'll tell you ın a wery few words a romantıc little story about another barber as p'r'aps you may never have heerd "

"Samivel!" said Mr Weller, again bringing his watch and the table into smart collision, "address your obserwa-tions to the cheer, sir, and not to priwate indiwiduals!"

"And if I might rise to order," said the barber in a soft voice, and looking round-him with a conciliatory smile as he leant over the table, with the knuckles of his left hand resting upon it,—"if I might rise to order, I would suggest that 'barbers' is not exactly the kind of language which is agreeable and soothing to our feelings You, sir, will correct me if I'm wrong, but I believe there & such a word in the dictionary as hairdressers"

"Wy then, sir, be parliamentary and call him vun all the more," returned his father "In the same vay as ev'ry gen'lman in another place is a konourable, ev'ry barber in this place is a hairdresser. Ven you read the speeches in the papers, and see as vun gen'lman says of another, 'the konourable member, if he vill allow me to call him so,' you vill understand, sir, that that means, 'if he vill allow me to keep up that 'ere pleasant and uniwersal fiction'"

It is a common remark, confirmed by history and experience, that great men rise with the circumstances in which they are placed. Mr Weller came out so strong in his capacity of chairman, that Sam was for some time prevented from speaking by a grin of surprise, which held his faculties enchained, and at last subsided in a long whistle of a single note. Nay, the old gentleman appeared even to have astonished himself, and that to no small extent, as was demonstrated by the vast amount of chuckling in which he indulged, after the utterance of these lucid remarks.

"Here's the story," said Sam "Vunce upon a time there was a young hairdresser as opened a wery smart little shop with four wax dummies in the winder, two gen'lmen and two ladies-the gen'lmen vith blue dots for their beards, wery large viskers, oudacious heads of hair, uncommon clear eyes, and nostrils of amazin' pinkness, the ladies with their heads o' one side, their right forefingers on their lips, and their forms deweloped beautiful, in vich last respect they had the adwantage over the gen'lmen, as wasn't allowed but wery little shoulder, and terminated rayther abrupt in fancy drapery He had also a many hairbrushes and tooth-brushes bottled up in the winder, neat glass-cases on the counter, a floor-clothed cuttin'-room upstairs, and a weighin'-macheen in the shop, right opposite But the great attraction and ornament was the dummies, which this here young hairdresser was constantly a runnin' out in the road to look at, and constantly a runnin' in agin to touch up and polish, in short, he was so proud on 'em, that ven Sunday come, he wos always wretched and mis'rable to think they wos behind the shutters, and looked anxiously for Monday on that account Vun o' these dummies wos a fav'rite vith him beyond the others, and ven any of his acquaintance asked him wy he didn't get married—as the young ladies he know'd, in partickler, often did—he used to say, 'Never! I never vill enter into the bonds of vedlock,' he says, 'until I meet vith a young 'ooman as realizes my idea o' that 'ere fairest dummy vith the light hair. Then, and not till then,' he says, 'I vill approach the altar' All the young ladies he know'd as had got dark hair told him this wos wery sinful, and that he wos wurshippin' a idle, but them as wos at all near the same shade as the dummy coloured up wery much, and wos observed to think him a wery nice young man."

"Samivel," said Mr Weller, gravely, "a member o' this associashun bein' one o' that 'ere tender sex which is now immedetly referred to, I have to rekvest that you vill make no reflections"

"I ain't a makin' any, am I' inquired Sam

"Order, sir!" rejoined Mr Weller, with severe dignity Then, sinking the chairman in the father, he added, in his usual tone of voice "Samivel, drive on!"

Sam interchanged a smile with the housekeeper, and proceeded -

"The young hairdresser hadn't been in the habit o' makin' this avowal above six months, ven he en-countered a young lady as wos the wery picter of the fairest dummy 'Now,' he says, 'it's all up I am a slave!' The young lady wos not only the picter o' the fairest dummy, but she was wery romantic, as the young hairdresser was, too, and he says, 'Oh!' he says, 'here's a community o' feelin', here's a flow o' soul!' he says, 'here's a interchange o' sentiment!' The young lady didn't say much, o' course, but she expressed herselt agreeable, and shortly artervards vent to see him with a mutual friend The hairdresser rushes out to meet her, but d'rectly she sees the dummies she changes colour and falls a tremblin' wiolently 'Look up, my love,' says the hairdresser 'behold your imige in my winder, but not correcter than in my 'art!' 'My imige!' she says 'Yourn!' replies the hairdresser 'But whose imige is that?' she says, a pinting at vun o' the gen'lmen 'No vun's, my love,' he says, 'it is but a idea' 'A idea!' she cries 'it is a portrait, I feel it is a portrait, and that 'ere noble face must be in the millingtary!' 'Wot do I hear!' says he, a crumplin' his curls 'Villiam Gibbs,' she says, quite firin, 'never renoo the subject I respect you as a friend,' she says, 'but my affections is set upon that manly brow 'This,' says the hairdresser, 'is a reg'lar blight, and in it I perceive the hand of Fate Farevell!' Vith these vords he rushes into the shop, breaks the dummy's nose vith a blow of his curlin'-irons, melts him down at the parlour fire, and never smiles artervards"

"The young lady, Mr Weller?" said the housekeeper

"Why, ma'am," said Sam, "finding that Fate had a spite agin her, and everybody she come into contact vith, she never smiled neither, but read a deal o' poetry and pined avay,—by rayther slow degrees, for she am't dead yet—It took a deal o' poetry to kill the hairdresser, and some people say arter all that it was more the gin and water as caused him to be run over, p'r'aps it was a little o' both, and came o' mixing the two"

The barber declared that Mr Weller had related one of the most interesting stories that had ever come within his knowledge, in which opinion the housekeeper entirely con-

"Are you a married man, sir?" inquired Sam
The barber replied that he had not that honour

"I s'pose you mean to be?" said Sam

"Well," replied the barber, rubbing his hands smirkingly, "I don't know, I don't think it's very likely"

"That's a bad sign," said Sam, "if you'd said you meant to be vun o' these days, I should ha' looked upon you as bein' safe You're in a wery precarious state"

"I am not conscious of any danger, at all events," re-

"No more wos I, sir," said the elder Mr Weller, interposing, "those vere my symptoms, exactly I've been took that vay twice Keep your vether eye open, my friend, or you're gone"

There was something so very solemn about this admonition, both in its matter and manner, and also in the way in which Mr Weller still kept his eye fixed upon the unsuspecting victim, that nobody cared to speak for some little time, and might not have cared to do so for some time longer, if the housekeeper had not happened to sigh, which called off the old gentleman's attention and gave rise to a gallant inquiry whether "there was anythin wery piercin' in that 'ere little heart?"

"Dear me, Mr Weller!" said the housekeeper, laughing

"No, but is there anythin' as agitates it;" pursued the "Has it always been obderrate, always old gentleman opposed to the happiness o' human creeturs? Eh? Has 1+7",

At this critical juncture for her blushes and confusion, the housekeeper discovered that more ale was wanted, and hastily withdrew into the cellar to draw the same, followed by the barber, who insisted on carrying the candle looked after her with a very complacent expression of face, and after him with some disdain. Mr Weller caused his glance to travel slowly round the kitchen, until at length it rested on his son

"Sammy," said Mr Weller, "I mistrust that barber"
"Wot for?" returned Sam, "wot's he got to do with you? You're a nice man, you are, arter pretendin' all kinds o' terror, to go a payin' compliments and talkin' about hearts and piercers "

The imputation of gallantry appeared to afford Mr Weller the utmost delight, for he replied in a voice choked by suppressed laughter, and with the tears in his eyes -

"Wos I a talkin' about hearts and piercers,-wos I though, Sammy, eh?"

"Wos you? of course you wos"

"She don't know no better, Sammy, there ain't no harm in it,—no danger, Sammy, she's only a punster seemed pleased, though, didn't she? O' course, she wos pleased, it's nat'ral she should be, wery nat'ral "

"He's wain of it! 'exclaimed Sam, joining in his father's

"Hush!" replied Mr Weller, composing his features, "they're a comin' back,—the little heart's a comin' back.

But mark these wurds o' mine once more, and remember 'em ven vour father says he said 'em Samivel. I mistrust that 'ere deceifful barber "

Two or three evenings after the institution of Mr Weller's Watch. I thought I heard, as I walked in the garden, the voice of Mr Weller himself at no great distance, and stopping once or twice to listen more attentively, I found that the sounds proceeded from my housekeeper's little sitting-room, which is at the back of the house I took no further notice of the circumstance at that time, but it formed the subject of a conversation between me and my friend Jack Redburn next morning, when I found that I had not been deceived in my impression Jack furnished me with the following particulars, and as he appeared to take extraordinary pleasure in relating them, I have begged him in future to jot down any such domestic scenes or occurrences that may please his humour, in order that they may be told in his own way I must confess that, as Mr Pickwick and he are constantly together, I have been influenced, in making this request, by a secret desire to know something of their proceedings

On the evening in question, the housekeeper's room was arranged with particular care, and the housekeeper herself was very smartly dressed The preparations, however, were not confined to mere showy demonstrations, as tea was prepared for three persons, with a small display of preserves and jams and sweet cakes, which heralded some uncommon occasion Miss Benton (my housekeeper bears that name) was in a state of great expectation, too, frequently going to the front door and looking anxiously down the lane, and more than once observing to the servant-girl that she expected company, and hoped no accident had

A modest ring at the bell at length allayed her fears, and Miss Benton, hurrying into her own room and shutting herself up, in order that she might preserve that appearance of being taken by surprise which is so essential to the polite reception of visitors, awaited their coming with a smiling countenance

"Good ev'nin', mum," said the older Mr Weller, looking in at the door after a prefatory tap "I'm afeerd we've come in rayther arter the time, mum, but the young colt being full o' wice, has been a boltin' and shyin' and gettin' his leg over the traces to sich a extent that if he an't wery soon broke in, he'll wex me into a broken heart, and then he'll never be brought out no more except to learn his letters from the writin' on his grandfather's tombstone"

With these pathetic words, which were addressed to something outside the door about two feet six from the ground. Mr Weller introduced a very small boy firmly set upon a couple of very sturdy legs, who looked as if nothing could ever knock him down Besides having a very round face strongly resembling Mr Weller's, and a stout little body of exactly his build, this young gentleman, standing with his little legs very wide apart, as if the top-boots were familiar to them, actually winked upon the housekeeper with his infant eye, in imitation of his grandfather

"There's a naughty boy, mum," said M1 Weller, bursting with delight, "there's a immoral Tony Wos there ever a little chap o' four year and eight months old as vinked his eye at a strange lady afore?"

As little affected by this observation as by the former appeal to his feelings, Master Weller elevated in the air a small model of a coach whip which he carried in his hand, and addressing the housekeeper with a shrill "ya—hip!" inquired if she was "going down the road," at which happy adaptation of a lesson he had been taught from infancy, Mr Weller could restrain his feelings no longer, but gave him twopence on the spot

"It's in wain to deny it, mum," said Mr Weller, "this here is a poy arter his grandfather's own heart, and beats out all the boys as ever wos or will be. Though at the same time, mum," added Mr. Weller, trying to look gravely down upon his favourite, "it was wery wrong on him to want to—over all the posts as we come along, and wery cruel on him to force poor grandfather to lift him cross-legged over every vun of 'em. He wouldn't pass vun single blessed post, mum, and at the top o' the lane there's seven-andforty on 'em all in a row, and wery close together."

Here Mr Weller, whose feelings were in a perpetual conflict between pride in his grandson's achievements and a sense of his own responsibility, and the importance of impressing him with moral truths, burst into a fit of laughter, and suddenly checking himself, remarked in a severe tone that little boys as made their grandfathers put 'em

By this time the housekeeper had made tea, and little Tony, placed on a chair beside her, with his eyes nearly on a level with the top of the table, was provided with various delicacies which yielded him extreme contentment. The housekeeper (who seemed rather afraid of the child, notwithstanding her caresses) then patted him on the head, and declared that he was the finest boy she had ever seen

"Wy, mum," said Mi Weller, "I don't think you'll see a many sich, and that's the truth But if my son Samivel vould give me my vay, mum, and only dis-pense with his —might I venter to say the vurd?"

"What word, Mr Weller?" said the housekeeper, blushing slightly

"Petticuts, mum," returned that gentleman, laying his hand upon the garments of his grandson "If my son Samivel, mum, vould only dis-pense vith these here, you'd see such a alteration in his appearance, as the imagination can't depicter"

"But what would you have the child wear instead, Mr Weller?" said the housekeeper

"I've offered my son Samivel, mum, agen and agen," returned the old gentleman, "to purwide him at my own cost vith a suit o' clothes as 'ud be the makin' on him.

and form his mind in infancy for those pursuits as I hope the family o' the Vellers vill always dewote themselves to Tony, my boy, tell the lady wot them clothes are, as grandfather says father ought to let you vear"

"A little white hat and a little sprig weskut and little knee cords and little top-boots and a little green coat with little bright buttons and a little welwet collar," replied

"That's the cos-toom, mum," said Mr Weller, looking proudly at the housekeeper "Once make sich a model on him as that, and you'd say he wos a angel!"

Perhaps the housekeeper thought that in such a guise young Tony would look more like the angel at Islington than anything else of that name, or perhaps she was disconcerted to find her previously-conceived ideas disturbed, as angels are not commonly represented in top-boots and sprig waistcoats. She coughed doubtfully, but said nothing

"How many brothers and sisters have you, my dear?"

she asked, after a short silence

"One brother and no sister at all," replied Tony "Sam his name is, and so's my father's Do you know my father?"

"Oh, yes, I know him," said the housekeeper, graciously "Is my father fond of you?" pursued Tony

"I hope so," rejoined the smiling housekeeper

Tony considered a moment, and then said, "Is my grandfather fond of you?"

This would seem a very easy question to answer, but instead of replying to it, the housekeeper smiled in great confusion, and said that really children did ask such extraordinary questions that it was the most difficult thing in the world to talk to them. Mr Weller took upon himself to reply that he was very fond of the lady, but the housekeeper entreating that he would not put such things into the child's head, Mr Weller shook his own while she looked another way, and seemed to be troubled with a misgiving that captivation was in progress. It was, perhaps, on this account that he changed the subject precipitately

"It's wery wrong in little boys to make game o' their grandfathers, an't it, mum?" said Mr Weller, shaking his head waggishly, until Tony looked at him, when he counterfeited the deepest dejection and sorrow

"Oh, very sad!" assented the housekeeper "But I hope no little boys do that?"

"There is vun young Turk, mum," said Mr Weller, "as havin' seen his grandfather a little overcome vith drink on the occasion of a friend's birthday, goes a reelin' and staggerin' about the house, and makin' believe that he's the old gen'lm'n"

"Oh, quite shocking!" cried the housekeeper

"Yes, mum," said Mr Weller, "and previously to so doin', this here young traitor that I'm a-speakin' of, pinches his little nose to make it red, and then he gives a hiccup and says, 'I'm all right,' he says, 'give us another song!' Ha, ha! 'Give us another song,' he says Ha, ha, ha!"

In his excessive delight, Mr Weller was quite unmindful of his moral responsibility, until little Tony kicked up his legs, and laughing immoderately, cried, "That was me, that was," whereupon the grandfather, by a great effort,

"No, Tony, not you," said Mr Weller "I hope it warn't you, Tony It must ha' been that 'ere naughty little chap as comes sometimes out o' the empty watch-box round the corner,—that same little chap as wos found standing on the table afore the looking-glass, pretending to shave himself vith a oyster-knife"

"He didn't hurt himself, I hope?" observed the house-

"Not he, mum," said Mr Weller, proudly, "bless your heart, you might trust that 'ere boy vith a steam-engine a'most, he's such a knowin' young but suddenly recollecting himself and observing that Tony perfectly understood and appreciated the compliment, the old gentleman groaned and observed that "it wos all wery shockin'—wery"

"Oh, he's a bad un," said Mr Weller, "is that 'ere watchbox boy, makin' such a noise and litter in the back yard, he does, waterin' wooden horses and feedin' of 'em vith grass, and perpetivally spillin' his little brother out of a veelbarrow and frightenin' his mother out of her vits, at the wery moment wen she's expectin' to increase his stock of happiness vith another play-feller,—oh, he's a bad one! He's even gone so far as to put on a pair of paper spectacles as he got his father to make for him, and walk up and down the garden vith his hands behind him in imitation of Mr Pickwick,—but Tony don't do sich things, oh, no!"

"He knows better, he does," said Mr Weller "He knows that if he wos to come sich games as these nobody wouldn't love him, and that his grandfather in partickler couldn't abear the sight on him, for vich reasons Tony's always good "

"Always good," echoed Tony, and his grandfather immediately took him on his knee and kissed him, at the same time, with many nods and winks, slyly pointing at the child's head with his thumb, in order that the housekeeper, otherwise deceived by the admirable manner in which he (Mr Weller) had sustained his character, might not suppose that any other young gentleman was referred to, and might clearly understand that the boy of the watch-box was but an imaginary creation, and a fetch of Tony himself, invented for his improvement and reformation

Not confining himself to 2 mere verbal description of his grandson's abilities, Mr Weller, when tea was finished, invited him by various gifts of pence and halfpence to smoke imaginary pipes, drink visionary beer from real pots, imitate his grandfather without reserve, and in particular to go through the drunken scene, which threw the old gen tleman into ecstasies and filled the housekeeper with wonder Nor was Mr Weller's pride satisfied with even this display, for when he took his leave he carried the child, like some rare and astonishing curiosity, first to the barber's house and afterwards to the tobacconist's, at each of which places he repeated his performances with the utmost effect to applauding and delighted audiences. It was half-past nine o'clock when Mr Weller was last seen carrying him home upon his shoulder, and it has been winspered abroad that at that time the infant Tony was rather intoxicated *

I was musing the other evening upon the characters and incidents with which I had been so long engaged, wondering how I could ever have looked forward with pleasure to the completion of my tale, and reproaching myself for having done so, as if it were a kind of cruelty to those companions of my solitude whom I had now dismissed, and could never again recall, when my clock struck ten Punctual to the hour, my friends appeared

On our last night of meeting, we had finished the story which the reader has just concluded. Our conversation took the same current as the meditations which the entrance of my friends had interrupted, and The Old Curiosity Shop was the staple of our discourse.

I may confide to the reader now that in connection with this little history I had something upon my mind, some thing to communicate which I had all along with difficulty repressed, something I had deemed it, during the progress of the story, necessary to its interest to disguise, and which, now that it was over, I wished, and was yet reluctant, to disclose

To conceal anything from those to whom I am attached, is not in my nature. I can never close my lips where I have opened my heart. This temper, and the consciousness of having done some violence to it in my nairative, laid me under a restraint which I should have had great difficulty in overcoming, but for a timely remark from Mi Miles, who, as I hinted in a former paper, is a gentleman of business habits, and of great exactness and propriety in all his transactions.

"I could have wished," my friend objected, "that we had been made acquainted with the single gentleman's name I don't like his withholding his name. It made me look upon him at first with suspicion, and caused me to doubt his moral character, I assure you I am fully satisfied by this time of his being a worthy creature, but in this respect he certainly would not appear to have acted at all like a man of business."

"My friends," said I, drawing to the table, at which they were by this time seated in their usual chairs, "do you remember that this story bore another title besides that one we have so often heard of late?"

Mr Miles had his pocket-book out in an instant, and referring to an entry therein, rejoined, "Certainly Personal Adventures of Master Humphrey Here it is I made a note of it at the time"

I was about to resume what I had to tell them, when the same Mr Miles again interrupted me, observing that the narrative originated in a personal adventure of my own, and that was no doubt the reason for its being thus designated

This led me to the point at once

"You will one and all forgive me," I returned, "if, for the greater convenience of the story, and for its better introduction, that adventure was fictitious I had my share, indeed,—no light or trivial one,—in the pages we have read, but it was not the share I feigned to have at first 'The younger brother, the single gentleman, the nameless actor in this little drama, stands before you now"

It was easy to see that they had not expected this disclosure

"Yes," I pursued "I can look back upon my part in it with a calm, half-smiling pity for myself as for some other man But I am he, indeed, and now the chief sorrows of my life are yours"

I need not say what true gratification I derived from the sympathy and kindness with which this acknowledgment was received, nor how often it had risen to my lips before, nor how difficult I had found it—how impossible, when I came to those passages which touched me most, and most nearly concerned me—to sustain the character I had assumed It is enough to say that I replaced in the clock-case the record of so many trials,—sorrowfully, it is true, but with a softened sorrow which was almost pleas ure, and felt that in living through the past again, and communicating to others the lesson it had helped to teach me, I had been a happier man

We lingered so long over the leaves from which I had read, that as I consigned them to their former restingplace, the hand of my trusty clock pointed to twelve, and there came towards us upon the wind the voice of the deep and distant bell of St Paul's as it struck the hour of

"This," said I, returning with a manuscript I had taken at the moment, from the same repository, "to be opened to such music, should be a tale where London's face by night is darkly seen, and where some deed of such a time as this is dimly shadowed out. Which of us here has seen the working of that great machine whose voice has just now ceased?"

Mr Pickwick had, of course, and so had Mr Miles Jack and my deaf friend were in the minority telling them of the fancy I had about it

I paid my fee of twopence upon entering, to one of the money-changers who sit within the Temple, and falling, after a few turns up and down, into the quiet train of thought which such a place awakens, paced the echoing stones like some old monk-whose present world lay all within its walls As I looked afar up into the lofty dome, I could not help wondering what were his reflections whose genius reared that mighty pile, when, the last small wedge of timber fixed, the last nail driven into its home for many centuries, the clang of hammers, and the hum of busy voices gone, and the Great Silence whole years of noise had helped to make, reigning undisturbed around. he mused, as I did now, upon his work, and lost himself amid its vast extent I could not quite determine whether the contemplation of it would impress him with a sense of greatness or of insignificance, but when I remembered how long a time it had taken to erect, in how short a space it might be traversed even to its remotest parts, for how brief a term he, or any of those who cared to bear his name, would live to see it, or know of its existence, I imagined him far more melancholy than proud, and look ing with regret upon his labour done. With these thoughts in my mind, I began to ascend, almost unconsciously, the flight of steps leading to the several wonders of the building, and found myself before a barrier where another money-taker sat, who demanded which among them I would choose to see There were the stone gallery, he said, and the whispering gallery, the geometrical staircase, the room of models, the clock—the clock being quite in my way, I stopped him there, and chose that sight from all the rest

I groped my way into the Turret which it occupies, and saw before me, in a kind of loft, what seemed to be a great, old oaken press with folding doors These being thrown back by the attendant (who was sleeping when I came upon him, and looked a drowsy fellow, as though his close companionship with Time had made him quite indifferent to it), disclosed a complicated crowd of wheels and chains in iron and brass, great, sturdy, rattling engines,—suggestive of breaking a finger put in here or there, and grinding the bone to powder,—and these were the Clock! Its very pulse, if I may use the word, was like no other clock It did not mark the flight of every moment with a gentle second stroke, as though it would check old Time, and have him stay his pace in pity, but measured it with one sledge-hammer beat, as if its business were to crush the seconds as they came trooping on, and remorselessly to clear a path before the Day of Judgment

I sat down opposite to it, and hearing its regular and neverchanging voice, that one deep constant note, uppermost amongst all the noise and clatter in the streets below, marking that, let that tumult rise or fall, go on or stop, let it be night or noon, to-morrow or to-day, this year or next,—it still performed its functions with the same dull constancy, and regulated the progress of the life around, the fancy came upon me that this was London's heart, and that when it should cease to beat, the City would be no more.

It is night Calm and unmoved amidst the scenes that darkness favours, the great heart of London throbs in its Giant breast Wealth and beggary, vice and virtue, guilt and innocence, repletion and the direst hunger, all treading on each other and crowding together, are gathered Draw but a little circle above the clustering housetops, and you shall have within its space everything, with its opposite extreme and contradiction, close beside Where vonder feeble light is shining, a man is but this moment dead The taper at a few yards' distance is seen by eyes that have this instant opened on the world There are two houses separated by but an inch or two of wall In one, there are quiet minds at rest, in the other, a waking conscience that one might think would trouble the very In that close corner where the roofs shrink down and cower together as if to hide their secrets from the handsome street hard by, there are such dark crimes, such miseries and horrors, as could be hardly told in whispers the handsome street, there are folks asleep who have dwelt there all their lives, and have no more knowledge of these things than if they had never been, or were transacted at the remotest limits of the world, -who, if they were hinted at would shake their heads, look wise, and frown, and say they were impossible, and out of Nature,—as if all great towns were not Does not this Heart of London, that nothing moves, nor stops, nor quickens,—that goes on the same let what will be done, does it not express the City's character well?

The day begins to break, and soon there is the hum and noise of life. Those who have spent the night on dooisteps and cold stones crawl off to beg, they who have slept in beds come forth to their occupation, too, and business is astir. The fog of sleep rolls slowly off, and London shines awake. The streets are filled with carriages, and people gaily clad. The jails are full, too, to the throat, nor have the workhouses or hospitals much room to spare. The courts of law are crowded. Taverns have their regular frequenters by this time, and every mart of traffic has its throng. Each of these places is a world, and has its own inhabitants, each is distinct from, and almost unconscious of the existence of any other There are some few people well to do, who remember to have heard it said, that numbers of men and women—thousands, they think it was -get up in London every day, unknowing where to lay their heads at night, and that there are quarters of the town where misery and famine always are They don't believe it quite,—there may be some truth in it, but it is exaggerated, of course So, each of these thousand worlds goes on, intent upon itself, until night comes again,-first with its lights and pleasures, and its cheerful streets, then with its guilt and darkness

Heart of London, there is a moral in thy every stroke! as I look on at thy indomitable working, which neither death, nor press of life, nor grief, nor gladness out of doors will influence one jot, I seem to hear a voice within thee which sinks into my heart, bidding me, as I elbow my way among the crowd, have some thought for the meanest wretch that passes, and, being a man, to turn away with scorn and pride from none that bear the human shape

I am by no means sure that I might not have been tempted to enlarge upon the subject, had not the papers that lay before me on the table been a silent reproach for even this digression I took them up again when I had

The handwriting was strange to me, for the manuscript had been fairly copied. As et is against our rules, in such a case, to inquire into the authorship until the reading is concluded, I could only glance at the different faces round me, in search of some expression which should betray the writer Whoever he might be, he was prepared for this, and gave no sign for my enlightenment

I had the papers in my hand, when my deaf friend interposed with a suggestion .

"It has occurred to me," he said, "bearing in mind your sequel to the tale we have finished, that if such of us as have anything to relate of our own lives could interweave it with our contribution to the Clock, it would be well to This need be no restraint upon us, either as to time, or place, or incident, since any real passage of this kind may be surrounded by fictitious circumstances, and represented by fictitious characters. What if we make this an article of agreement among ourselves?"

The proposition was cordially received, but the difficulty appeared to be that here was a long story written before we had thought of it

"Unless," said I, "it should have happened that the writer of this tale—which is not impossible, for men are apt to do so when they write—has actually mingled with it something of his own endurance and experience"

Nobody spoke, but I thought I detected in one quarter that this was really the case

"If I have no assurance to the contrary," I added, there fore, "I shall take it for granted that he has done so, and that even these papers come within our new agreement Everybody being mute, we hold that understanding, if you please"

And here I was about to begin again, when Jack informed us softly, that during the progress of our last narrative, Mr Weller's Watch had adjourned its sittings from the kitchen, and regularly met outside our door, where he had no doubt that august body would be found at the present moment As this was for the convenience of listening to our stories, he submitted that they might be suffered to come in, and hear them more pleasantly

To this we one and all yielded a ready assent, and the party being discovered, as Jack had supposed, and invited to walk in, entered (though not without great confusion at having been detected), and were accommodated with chairs

Then, the lamp being trimmed, the fire well stirred and burning brightly, the hearth clean swept, the curtains closely drawn, the clock wound up, we entered on our new story,

—Barnaby Rudge

* * * * * * *

[This is as indicated the final appearance of Master Humphrey's Clock It forms the conclusion of Barnaby Rudge]

It is again midnight My fire burns 'cheerfully, the room is filled with my old friend's sober voice, and I am left to muse upon the story we have just now finished

It makes me smile, at such a time as this, to think if there were any one to see me sitting in my easy-chair, my grey head hanging down my eyes bent thoughtfully upon the glowing embers, and my crutch-emblem of my helplessness-lying upon the hearth at my feet, how solitary I should seem Yet though I am the sole tenant of this chimney corner, though I am childless and old, I have no sense of loneliness at this hour, but am the centre of a silent group whose company I love

Thus, even age and weakness have their consolations If I were a younger man, if I were more active, more strongly bound and tied to life, these visionary friends would shun me, or I should desire to fly from them Being what I am, I can court their society, and delight in it, and pass whole hours in picturing to myself the shadows that perchance flock every night into this chamber, and in imagining with pleasure what kind of interest they have in the frail,

All the friends I have ever lost I find again among these visitors I love to fancy their spirits hovering about me, feeling still some earthly kindness for their old companion, and watching his decay "He is weaker, he declines apace, he draws nearer and nearer to us, and will soon be conscious of our existence" What is there to alarm me in this? It is encouragement and hope

These thoughts have never crowded on me half so fast as they have done to night * Faces I had long forgotten have become familiar to me once again, traits I had endeavoured to recall for years have come before me in an instant, nothing is changed but me, and even I can be my former self at will

Raising my eyes but now to the face of my old clock, I remember, quite involuntarily, the veneration, not unmixed with a sort of childish awe, with which I used to sit and watch it as it ticked, unheeded in a dark staircase corner, I recollect looking more grave and steady when I met its dusty face, as if, having that strange kind of life within it, and being free from all excess of vulgar appetite, and warnall the house by night and day, it were a sage How eften have I listened to it as it told the beads of time, and wondered at its constancy! How often watched it slowly pointing round the dial, and, while I panted for the eagerly expected hour to come, admired, despite myself, its steadiness of purpose and lofty freedom from all human strife, impatience, and desire!

I thought it cruel once It was very hard of heart, to my mind, I remember It was an old servant even then, and I felt as though it ought to show some sorrow, as though it wanted sympathy with us in our distress, and were a dull, heartless, mercenary creature Ah! how soon I learnt to know that in its ceaseless going on, and in its being checked or stayed by nothing, lay its greatest kindness, and the only balm for grief and wounded peace of mind

To-night, to-night, when this tranquillity and calm are on my spirits, and memory presents so many shifting scenes before me, I take my quiet stand at will by many a fire that has been long extinguished, and mingle with the cheerful group that cluster round it If I could be sorrowful in such a mood, I should grow sad to think what a poor blot I was upon their youth and beauty once, and now how few remain to put me to the blush, I should grow sad to think that such among them as I sometimes meet with in my daily walks are scarcely less infirm than I, that time has brought us to a level, and that all dis tinctions fade and vanish as we take our trembling steps towards the grave

But memory was given us for better purposes than this, and mine is not a torment, but a source of pleasure. To muse upon the gaiety and youth I have known suggests to me glad scenes of harmless mirth that may be passing now. From contemplating them apart, I soon become an actor in these little dramas, and humouring my fancy, lose myself among the beings it invokes

When my fire is bright and high, and a warm blush mantles in the walls and ceiling of this ancient room, when my clock makes cheerful music, like one of those chirping insects who delight in the warm hearth, and are sometimes, by a good superstition, looked upon as the harbingers of fortune and plenty to that household in whose mercies they put their humble trust when everything is in a ruddy genial glow, and there are voices in the crack ling flame, and smiles in its flashing light, other smiles and other voices congregate around me, invading, with their pleasant harmony, the silence of the time

For then a knot of youthful creatures gather round my fireside, and the room re echoes to their merry voices My solitary chair no longer holds its ample place before the fire, but is wheeled into a smaller corner, to leave more room for the broad cucle formed about the cheerful hearth I have sons, and daughters, and grandchildren, and we are assembled on some occasion of rejoicing common to us all It is a birthday, perhaps, or perhaps it may be Christmas time, but be it what it may, there is

In the chimney corner, opposite myself, sits one who has grown old beside me She is changed, of course, much changed, and yet I recognize the girl even in that grey hair and wrinkled brow Glancing from the laughing child who half hides in her ample skirts, and half peeps out,—and from her to the little matron of twelve years old, who sits so womanly and so demure at no great distance from me,—and from her again, to a fair girl in the full bloom of early womanhood, the centre of the group, who has glanced more than once towards the opening door, and by whom the children, whispering and tittering among themselves, will leave a vacant chair, although she bids them not,—I see her image thrice repeated, and feel how long it is before one form and set of features wholly pass away, if ever, from among the living While I am dwelling upon this, and tracing out the gradual change from infancy to youth, from youth to perfect growth, from that to age, and thinking, with an old man's pride, that she is comely yet, I feel a slight thin hand upon my arm, and, looking down, see seated at my feet a crippled boy,—a gentle, patient child,—whose aspect I know well He rests upon a little crutch,—I know it too,—and leaning on it as he climbs my footstool, whispers in my ear, "I am hardly one of these, dear grandfather, although I love them dearly They are very kind to me, but you will be kınder still, I know"

I have my hand upon his neck, and stoop to kiss him, when my clock strikes, my chair is in its old spot, and I am alone

What if I be? What if this fireside be tenantless, save for the presence of one weak old man? From my house-top I can look upon a hundred homes, in every one of which these social companions are matters of reality. In my daily walks I pass a thousand men whose cares are all forgotten, whose labours are made light, whose dull routine of work from day to day is cheered and brightened by their glimpses of domestic joy at home. Amid the struggles of this struggling town what cheerful sacrifices are made, what toil endured with readiness, what patience shown and fortitude displayed for the mere sake of home and its affections! Let me thank Heaven that I can people my fireside with shadows such as these, with shadows of bright objects that exist in crowds about me, and let me say, "I am alone no more"

I never was less so—I write it with a grateful heart—than I am to night Recollections of the past and visions of the present come to bear me company, the meanest man to whom I have ever given alms appears, to add his mite of peace and comfort to my stock, and whenever the fire within me shall grow cold, to light my path upon this earth no more, I pray that it may be at such an hour as this, and when I love the world as well as I do now

THE DEAF GENTLEMAN FROM HIS OWN APARTMENT

Our dear friend laid down his pen at the end of the foregoing paragraph, to take it up no more I little thought ever to employ mine upon so sorrowful a task as that which he has left me, and to which I now devote it

As he did not appear among us at his usual hour next morning, we knocked gently at his door. No answer being given, it was softly opened, and then, to our surprise, we saw him seated before the ashes of his fire, with a little table I was accustomed to set at his elbow when I left him for the night at a short distance from him, as though he had pushed it away with the idea of rising and returing to his bed. His crutch and footstool lay at his feet as usual, and he was dressed in his chamber-gown, which he had put on before I left him. He was reclining in his chair, in his accustomed posture, with his face towards the fire, and seemed absorbed in meditation,—indeed, at first, we almost hoped he was Going up to him, we found him dead I have often, very often, seen him sleeping, and always peacefully, but I never saw him look so calm and tranquil His face wore a serene, benign expression, which had impressed me very strongly when we last shook hands, not that he had ever had any other look, God knows, but there was something in this so very spiritual, so strangely and indefinably allied to youth, although his head was grey and venerable, that it was new even in him It came upon me all at once when on some slight pretence he called me back upon the previous night to take me by the hand again, and once more say, "God bless you"

A bell rope hung within his reach, but he had not moved towards it, nor had he stirred, we all agreed, except, as I have said, to push away his table, which he could have done and no doubt did, with a very slight motion of his hand He had relapsed for a moment into his late train of meditation, and, with a thoughtful smile upon his face, had died

I had long known it to be his wish that whenever this event should come to pass we might be all assembled in the house I therefore lost no time in sending for Mr Pickwick and for Mr Miles, both of whom arrived before the messenger's return

It is not my purpose to dilate upon the sorrow and affectionate emotions of which I was at once the witness and the sharer—But I may say, of the humbler mourners, that his faithful housekeeper was fairly heart broken, that the poor barber would not be comforted, and that I shall respect the homely truth and warmth of heart of Mr Weller and his son to the last moment of my life

"And the sweet old creetur, sir," said the elder Mr Weller to me in the afternoon, "has bolted Him as had no wice, and was so free from temper that a infant might ha' drove him has been took at last with that 'ere unawoidable fit o' staggers as we all must come to, and gone off his feed for ever! I see him," said the old gentleman, with a moisture in his eye, which could not be mistaken,—"I see him gettin', every journey, more and more groggy, I says to Samivel, 'My boy! the Grey's a goin' at the knees,' and now my predilictions is fatally werified, and him as I could never do enough to serve or show my likin' for, is up the great uniwersal spout o' natur"

I was not the less sensible of the old man's attachment because he expressed it in his peculiar manner. Indeed, I can truly assert of both him and his son, that notwithstanding the extraordinary dialogues they held together, and the strange commentaries and corrections with which each of them illustrated the other's speech, I do not think it possible to exceed the sincerity of their regret, and that I am sure their thoughtfulness and anxiety in anticipating the discharge of many little offices of sympathy would have done honour to the most delicate-minded persons

Our friend had frequently told us that his will would be found in a box in the Clock case, the key of which was in his writing desk. As he had told us also that he desired it to be opened immediately after his death, whenever that should happen, we met together that night for the fulfilment

We found it where he had told us, wrapped in a sealed paper, and with it a codicil of recent date, in which he named Mr Miles and Mr Pickwick his executors,—as having no need of any greater benefit from his estate than a generous token (which he bequeathed to them) of his friendship and remembrance

After pointing out the spot in which he wished his ashes to repose, he gave to "his dear old friends," Jack Redburn and myself, his house, his books, his furniture,—in short, all that his house contained, and with this legacy more ample means of maintaining it in its present state than we, with our habits and at our terms of life, can ever exhaust Besides these gifts, he left to us, in trust, an annual sum of no insignificant amount, to be distributed in charity among his accustomed pensioners—they are a long list—and such other claimants on his bounty as might, from time to time, present themselves And as true charity not only covers a multitude of sins, but includes a multitude of virtues, such as forgiveness, liberal construction, gentleness and mercy to the faults of others, and the remembrance of our own imperfections and advantages, he bade us not inquire too closely into the venial errors of the poor, but finding that they were poor, first to relieve and then endeavour—at an advantage—to reclaim them

To the housekeeper he left an annuity, sufficient for her comfortable maintenance and support through life. For the barber, who had attended him many years, he made a similar provision. And I may make two remarks in this place first, that I think this pair are very likely to club their means together and make a match of it, and secondly, that I think my friend had this result in his mind, for I have heard him say, more than once, that he could not concur with the generality of mankind in censuring equal marriages made in later life, since there were many cases in which such unions could not fail to be a wise and rational

The elder Mr Weller is so far from viewing this prospect with any feelings of jealousy, that he appears to be very much relieved by its contemplation, and his son, if I am not mistaken, participates in this feeling. We are all of opinion, however, that the old gentleman's danger, even at its crisis, was very slight, and that he merely laboured under one of those transitory weaknesses to which persons of his temperament are now and then liable, and which become less and less alarming at every return, until they wholly subside I have no doubt he will remain a jolly old widower for the rest of his life, as he has already inquired of me, with much gravity, whether a writ of habeas corpus would enable him to settle his property upon Tony beyond the possibility of recall, and has, in my presence, conjured his son, with tears in his eyes, that in the event of his ever becoming amorous again, he will put him in a strait-waistcoat until the fit is past, and distinctly inform the lady that his property is "made over"

Although I have very little doubt that Sam would dutifully comply with these injunctions in a case of extreme necessity, and that he would do so with perfect composure and coolness, I do not apprehend things will ever come to that pass, as the old gentleman seems perfectly happy in the society of his son, his pretty daughter in law, and his grandchildren, and has solemnly announced his determination to "take arter the old 'un in all respects," from which I infer that it is his intention to regulate his conduct by the model of Mr Pickwick, who will certainly set him the example of a single life.

I have diverged for a moment from the subject with which I set out, for I know that my friend was interested in these little matters, and I have a natural tendency to linger upon any topic that occupied his thoughts or gave him pleasure and amusement His remaining wishes are very briefly told He desired that we would make him the frequent subject of our conversation, at the same time, that we would never speak of him with an air of gloom or restraint, but frankly, and as one whom we still loved and hoped to meet again He trusted that the old house would wear no aspect of mourning, but that it would be lively and cheerful, and that we would not remove or cover up his picture, which hangs in our dining-room, but make it our companion as he had been His own room, our place of meeting, remains, at his desire, in its accustomed state, our seats are placed about the table as of old, his easy-chair, his desk, his crutch, his footstool, hold their accustomed places, and the Clock stands in its familiar corner into the chamber at stated times to see that all is as it should be, and to take care that the light and air are not shut out, for on that point he expressed a strong solicitude was his fancy that the apartment should not be inhabited, that it should be religiously preserved in this condition, and that the voice of his old companion should be heard no more

My own history may be summed up in very few words, and even those I should have spared the reader but for my friend's allusion to me some time since I have no deeper sorrow than the loss of a child,—an only daughter, who is living, and who fled from her father's house but a few weeks before our friend and I first met I had never spoken of this even to him, because I have always loved her, and I could not bear to tell him of her error until I could tell him also of her sorrow and regret Happily I was enabled to do so some time ago And it will not be long, with Heaven's leave, before she is restored to me, before I find in her and her husband the support of my declining years

Thus, since the death of our venerable friend, Jack Redburn and I have been the sole tenants of the old house, and, day by day, have lounged together in his favourite walks. Mindful of his injunctions, we have long been able to speak of him with ease and cheerfulness, and to remember him as he would be remembered. From certain allusions which Jack has dropped, to his having been deserted and cast off in early life, I am inclined to believe that some passages of his youth may possibly be shadowed out in the history of Mr. Chester and his son, but seeing that he avoids the subject, I have not pursued it

My task is done The chamber in which we have whiled away so many happy hours, not, I hope, without some pleasure and some profit, is deserted, our happy hour of meeting strikes no more, the chimney-corner has grown cold, and Master Humphrey's Clock has stopped for
